BEGINNING October 3, and ending November 6th, every postmaster in the United States is required to weigh separately every class of mail matter as well as the pouches, sacks and locks, sent out from his office, and report the exact total of each day's sending in pounds and ounces. This work is required once every four years, the result of which determines the compensation of railroads for transporting the mails. For offices which dispatch a number of mails each day, the thirty-five days' weighing represents a great amount of extra work for which there is no additional compensation.
