The Most Important Lesson.

The most important lesson for a young man to learn who wishes world, is, that to look after his employer's interests is the best way to serve his own. The world needs faithful and efficient young men more than anything else. It has no use at all for lazy and friv clous men who have no other object in their work than to put in the time in the easiest possible way, and whose only delight in labor is to hear the whistle blow for quitting time.

The man who is afraid of earniug more than he gets is in no danger of ever getting more than he carns. When a man is working for another he should not forget that he is working for himself. If his work is well and cheerfully done it reflects credit on him and creates a demand for his services that will inevitably increase his
