what was going on, and discover if I could which of the inhabitants had the most money. According to the talk of those I met with in the taverns, I was led to believe, that the three richest men in that any danger of discovery. part of the country, werea Mr. Sharp, David Sterret, and an old gentleman of the name of Keehan or M'Keehan. From information 4 received I rather concluded that the former had more land than money, as I understood he was in the habit of making a purchase of property every year, adding house to house and field to field; not believing Mr. Sharp to have by him as much cash as the others. I concluded upon robbing Mr. Sterrett, but hearing that he had a short time before that deposited all his money in the new bank at Carlisle, and in consequence of its stoppage had but from the people. little or no prospects of getting it out again, and learning, also, that SAVED AT GRAVE'S BRINK. he was a bond buyer a shaver of notes, and one of those people called man-eaters, and had disposed of all his ready money means in this way, I despaired of succeeding with him, and finally fixed upon old Mr. Keehan as the surest mark. I immediately set my ingenuity to work, to devise the best plan for accomplishing my purpose, and accordingly intended to waylay him on Sunday evening as he returned from church. I meant to carry him into the woods, tie him and threaten him with violence, until he told me where his treasure was lodged; on obtaining this informalrug store. tion, my plan was to go to the house and alarm the family, by making them believe, that I had just left the old man dying in the road about a mile off, and that he had begged me to send every one of them to him directly; I concluded that the intelligence would fact to my records of such pheoccasion great distress and con- nomena rather tends to aggravate price somewhat in excess of its fusion, and that in their absence, the solution of the problem.
