This seems to be very selfish and brutal advice, but the idea which the speaker had in mind was valuable. He meant to say that if one would keep in a healthful frame of mind it would be necessary to obtain the tonic influence of those who are filled with hope rather than to be depressed and "dragged down" by the influence of those who are dispirited, fatalistic and hopeless. "I would help others," said old Sir Thomas Browne in his "An- lethargy of the world's miasmaatomy of Melancholy," "out of a fellow feeling;" and that is the humane and civilized attitude to assume: but no pains should be spared in trying to prevent one-I've got a corner on several self from falling into the hopeachers, said the man with defectess and dejected state of mind cools, soothes, and heals cuts,
