

Farmers Want More Education.

hope of the future. It is through just such gatherings that broader ideas are inculcated and spread. Education is for the purpose of enabling a man to support himself, and the education which is the right of every man should be sufficient to fit a man to support himself and two dependent persons.

The Farmers' Institute is a school of practical science, and it is a school of high grade. While it does not take up a regular and exhaustive course of instruction, points out to farmers the sources whence they can obtain information on desired subjects, to cause the farmer to think and to inspire him with inspiration for his profession.

The Farmers' Institute is a need of the present day. So long as good soil could be had for a few dollars an acre, when insect enemies were few and not dangerous, and when rural life was simple and free from perplexing questions, there was little need for study or research. To-day all these things are changed and the agricultural question is coming to be a serious one.

The Farmers' Institute is practical. It teaches a man how to discover an unprofitable cow. It teaches him how to secure a cheap and well balanced ration, for the successful production of the dairy products most desired. It teaches how to cultivate the soil what methods should be followed and why these methods are best. It teaches how to spray the insect pests, what to use and when to apply the solution. How to breed his stock for special purposes.—It comes to the man in need, cheers and encourages him, enabling him to help himself and to conquer the obstacles in his path.

The institute also teaches a man not to despise his calling. It presents agriculture in its true aspect, as one of the learned professions, and keeps him from holding it up to his children in a disparaging light.

When a man stops studying his profession he has passed the dead line. It makes no difference whether he be sixty or forty, and it is a province of the Institute to wake such a man up, show him his danger and impress upon him the necessity for closer thought and gradually leaven the whole of his life.

While a man ought to regard public service as a duty the man who, while owning a hundred-acre farm cannot live without public office has not much in him.

The ruin of the ancient countries was brought about by the absorption of the people of the great cities and the deterioration of the people in these cities, and the only salvation for any country lies in the education of the rural people that they may intelligently direct the affairs of the land.

The United States Government recognizes the value of the farmers' Institutes by establishing, recently, a bureau of Normal Institutes, for the purpose of experimentation and for collecting statistics regarding what has been and is being done in the experimental stations of the nation.

This is but one of the many departments of the National Department of Agriculture which has done and is doing so much for the farmers of the nation. Prof. Hamilton claimed that the average farmer reads only the family Bible, the weekly market reports, and in times of great excitement the political party. He is too tired at the close of the day to read and he gradually drops into a rut, working in a mechanical, unthinking manner. It is to foster and to encourage education and to impress the necessity for education and intelligence on the part of farmers that these institutes are conducted, and they ought to receive the support and encouragement of every public spirited citizen.
