The Evolution of the Mind.

above the surrounding peaks, towers in crystalline grandeur to companionship with the stars. So Christianity, upheld by a faith divine, rises above all other beliefs, and in celestial serenity, holds communion with its God.

The next great factor in ameliorating world conditions is learning. In every modern nation it is a necessary factor. Every thing of importance has been examined under the search light of the power of learning. The stars have been numbered. Space has been measured. The finest atoms and the largest planets have alike been classified. As Athenian bravery arose with the danger at Marathon, so does the power of reason increase as the problems grow harder. Obstacles that have defied the power of the mind for ages are being swept away by this growing tide of universal understanding.

The third great factor in general growth is invention.

By invention's magic wand, forests have been transformed into cities the ore of the earth has been spun into a web that covers every inhabitable land, the lightning has been brought down from the heavens, and has been made the servant of man's genius, carrying his voice from state to state, and his thoughts around the earth. With the aid of inventions man has investigated the world. He has established colonies throughout the earth. On the terra incognita, of five centuries ago has been established the greatest and grandest of republics—our own United States. Invention has banished the age of superstition. It has aided in bringing "peace on earth and good will to men."

Records show that the mind of man has steadily advanced. Yet there are some who claim that man will again retrograde, and that our civilization will perish as did those of the Greeks and Romans. This theory may truthfully be refuted. There are two great causes, which tend to make a national intellect grow weaker. The first of which is the slavery of a part of a people in subjection to another part—a condition which the Creator never meant to have exist. The second is deadly wars. Most of the early peoples were guilty of both these evils, and some of these nations were the most enlightened of their time.

But now these wrongs are passing away. The human race is seen pursuing its career of greatest success, far above the clouds of slavery and perpetual war. The gray-haired usher, Time, is placing the crimes of mankind farther and farther back the endless aisles of antiquity. We need no more to dream of the golden age of the past; but rather look forward to the era of Truth and Justice, and believe with Milton—that "Time will run back and fetch the age of gold."

Then, judging by the intellectual works of man, we may rightly conclude; the mind is a variable, which slowly yet irresistibly approaches a limit of perfection. The tendency of the mind has ever been toward greatness. Like the chambered nautilus it has grown into larger habitations in each succeeding age. And like the nautilus it leaves its "outgrown shell by life's unresting sea." And in the future, as each age shall rescue its offspring from the mighty sepulchre of the past, and shall leave its store of knowledge on the already vast mound of truths accumulated, the philosopher of a day to come, mounting this height, may pierce his narrow horizon, and look farther and farther into the limitless infinity—"Still achieving, still pursuing," and ever rearing that great Example, in whose image man was created.

FOR THE LAND'S SAKE!

Each year finds an increase in the use of fertilizers. Many men, who, a few years ago, had no faith in the use of fertilizers, have been converted to a belief in their use by seeing the marvelous success of its use by their neighbor.

Many inferior grades of fertilizers have been thrown upon the market, which have had a tendency to weaken the confidence of people using phosphate as a crop producer.

I have heard many people express a desire to secure a reliable fertilizer; and after a careful investigation of the merits of several brands, I find that M. E. Wheeler & Co's. fertilizers are far superior to many makes now used in this section.

My first shipment of this excellent brand of phosphate is now in and every sack of it is fresh and pure stock.

To the man who wants a first class phosphate at the lowest possible price, I will say that a trial of my fertilizers will convince him that I carry a line without an equal.

My prices will surprise and please you.
