along the trail. They also established the trail so well that it can be followed by other parties next summer. Anerold measurements taken by the men place the height of the mountain at 20,500.

Ten men were in the party that left Fairbanks with dog teams in December. It was the theory of the leaders that the ascent would be less dangerous in early spring than later when the snow began to melt. This theory was confirmed by the experience of the expedition.

The expedition on reaching the base of the mountain went into camp, waited for better weather and planned the ascent. All werefamiliar with the great mountain. None of the men has scientific education. and they took no special apparatus except cameras and a barometer. They were equipped for prospecting, and traveled as light as possible and with the food supply of an Alaskan miner.

When the ascent was begun the first camp was made at the line of the willows, the second at 2,900 feet, the third at 10,000 feet and the fourth at 16,000 feet. From this camp the dash to the top was made. Four dogs went to the third camp and one to the fourth. Snowshoes were used most of the way and much time was consumed in carrying supplies to the fourth camp, travel over the steep ice compelling light loads and several trips. In several places crevasses were crossed on bridges of poles brought from the timbered

The party did not set out to disprove Dr. Cook's story, but to climb the mountain. It found the summits utterly unlike those pictured in Cook's book. On the rock peak it left an American flag 6 by 12 feet attached to the 14-foot staff, buttressed in rock. The flag was visible for a long distance on the north side of the mountain. The view from the summit was obscured by clouds at lower levels. The building of the monument about the flag staff was difficult because of the rarlfied atmosphere.
