Didn't Like Course Dinners.

A colored woman, native of the South, had been working for a flatdwelling family of moderate means in the East End, but resigned recently to accept a place bringing higher wages with a wealthy family who live in a large house on Euclid Heights and have their dinner served in courses every night just as if there was company, says the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

This colored woman had been brought up to put everything on the table at once, with the exception possibly of the dessert, and did not take kindly to the course system.

A few days ago her former mistress met her on the street and inquired how she liked her new place, "Oh, not ve'y well," she replied. "I don't like this hyah way of su'vin' things in cou'ses. The's too much shiftin' o' the dishes fo' the fewness o' the vittles."-Savannah News.

Unhappy Monsters.

A woman passenger on a transatlantic liner bothered the officers and captain unceasingly about whales. A hundred times a day she asked to be called if one was sighted.

"But, madam," expostulated the captain, finally, "why are you so anxious about this whale question?" "Because," she replied, "all my life I've wanted to see a whale blubber."-Success Magazine.

ard's love for all humankind was a belief in its goodness. Regardless of disastrous results, her experiences with sundry women and men left upon her consciousness only an assurance that their ultimate intention had been fair enough. That girl friends borrowed her prettiest clothes and returned them ripped and soiled was no proof of their meanness. Kathleen accepted the care of little Billy Rindge for an afternoon or of Baby Upton for a day, and bore with sweetness and patience the responsibilities they incurred, with the thought of how much worse it must be for their mothers to have said responsibilities indefinitely.

One afternoon, about 5, Kathleen was pouring tea for Billy Rindge's mother. Mrs. Rindge was just back from town and her arms ached with the weight of her shopping, and her feet ached with the heat and too much walking, and her head ached. More than all, her heart surged and filled and bubbled over with bitterness at the sight of Billy's best white pique suit, over which swept in graceful lines a perfect wonder of green and red paint. Billy had escaped Kathleen and everybody else interested, and invaded a painter's equipment in Kathleen's kitchen while the painter had his lunch out of doors under the trees. The trees were green, so rea soned Billy, and why not he? The roses were red, and so, with equal reasonableness, why not he? This was what Kathleen had made out of his answers to her remonstrances.

"You have no idea, Kathleen," Mrs. Rindge was saying, "what a care that child is. If I should have another one I think I should die. That suit is ruined, utterly, hopelessly ruined. Of course, I don't blame you, you mustn't think that, but really, isn't it enough to break anybody's heart to look at that suit?"

"I don't see how it could have been helped, Amy," Kathleen answered patiently. "Billy seems to know what he must do and what he can't do, and promises so sweetly and looks such a dear when he asks you things, that you don't know how to refuse him, and then, suddenly, the world topples over your head and you emerge to see Billy in some wretched plight. But you must love him so, Amy! Think what a baby girl would be like if she and Billy's curls and Billy's

"And Billy's love of mischief and Billy's guile and Billy's paint that won't come off," interrupted his mother. "Now we will go home, K thleen, though I do hate to leave here, everything is so cool and restful."

But they did go at last and Kathleen watched them turn toward home with relief in her heart. Suddenly she bethought her of something and rushed madly out of the house after

"Oh, Amy!" she shricked after the rapidly retreating figures, "did you get that ribbon for me and the lace

"I'm so sorry-forgot it untildidn't have any time left-" came back the disjointed sentences, Kathleen's courage failed her. Her dress for to-morrow night's dance was a dream, but it had no sash and she simply could not wear it unless she had some lace to finish the neck and sleeves.

A man on horseback met her before she reached her gateway. He noted her dejection. Maybe he thought* she would accept a little cheering. Anyway, he stopped his horse and dropped at Kathleen's side in time to be asked within for a cup of tea and a cake. It was very cheerful in Kathleen's den. There were just a few chairs that were made to sit in and a broad low couch and a fireplace. Before the fireplace Kathleen's favorite rug gave light to the otherwise dusky interior, a prayer rug, all amber and ruby and summer-sea blue. Dropping upon it and resting 'er head against a pile of pillows, Kathleen related her experiences for that one day. "And she borrowed my pearl brooch to fasten her collar because she came away in such a hurry that she forgot to put one on, and now she has gone home and forgotten to give it to me," Kathleen ended. She looked tired and hurt. "Treated you pretty roughly, didn't she?" sympathized the man who understood.

Somehow his hand found a resting place on Kathleen's shoulder; somehow his voice found an extra tender

"I don't know, but it may be my own vanity that's hurt," Kathleen said after a moment, "I wanted to look my best to-morrow night, as if clothes made the girl, and as if anybody would care more for me in a pink dress than he they would in a blue one." She flushed at the little slip she had made. Richard Prouty took immediate advantage. He had courted the coy young woman all summer, afraid to speak although impatient at delay, He told of his love and his loneliness in hurried words and, inspired by his own impetuosity, dropped his arm to the waist of the unresisting Kathleen and kissed her.

Kathleen pouted conquettishly be cause of the slip she had made but tired and disappointed, put her head upon his shoulder and said: "Dick, you were a goose not to see that I loved you all the time."-MARTHA PROUTY.

On the Car.

A gentleman who was seated behind a negro in a Main street car in Memphis vouches for this story: All the seats were taken when a neatly dressed young negress, evi-

"Doan' mention it, miss," replied the swarthy Chesterfield; "It ain't no depravity."-St. Louis Republic.
