SYNOPSIS.

Francois Beaupre, a peasant babe of three years, after an amusing incident in which Marshal Ney figures, is made a Chevalier of France by the Emperor Napoleon, who prophesied that the boy might one day be a marshal of France under another Bonaparte. At the age of ten, Francois visits General Baron Gaspard Gourgaud, who with Allice, his seven-year-old daughter, who campained with the general and his brother, Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. A soldier of the Empire under Napoleon he fires the boy's imagination and becomes a copyist for the general and learns of the friendship between the general and Marquis Zappi, who campained with the general and his brother, Marquis Zappi and his son, Pietro, arrive at the Chateau. The general agrees to go to America. The Marquis asks Francois to be a friend of his son. The general solemnly promises to take the boy to the Chateau to live. Marquis Zappi dies leaving Pietro as a ward of the general. Allice, Pietro and Francois meet a strange boy who proves to be Prince Louis Napoleon. Francois saves his life. The general discovers Francois loves his daughter, Allice, and extracts a promise from him that he will not interfere between the girl and Pietro. Francois goes to the Chateau to see Pietro. Queen Hortense plans the escape of her son Louis Napoleon by disguising him and Marquis Zappi as her brother. Francois takes Marquis Zappi's place, who is ill in the escape of Hortense and Louis. Dressed as Louis, brother Francois leaves the Austrian camp and escapes following the prince and his mother to escape. Francois is a prisoner of the Austrians for five years, in the castle owned by Pietro in Italy. He discovers in his guard one of Pietro's old family servants and through him sends word to his friends of his plight. The general, Allice and Pietro plan Francois' escape. Francois receives a note from Pietro explaining in detail how to escape from his prison. Allice awaits him on horseback and leads him to his friends on board the American sailing vessel, the "Lovely Lucy." Francois, as a guest of Harry Hampton, on the estate of the general in America, manages Pietro's estate in Virginia. Lucy Hampton falls in love with Francois. Prince Louis Napoleon in America becomes the guest of the Hamptons, where he meets Francois. Lucy Hampton reveals her love for Francois after the latter saves the life of Harry Hampton and is himself induced in the effort. Francois tells Lucy his plot. His heart falls and he is forced to return to America. Later Napoleon summons him to London to aid him in his plot to seize the French throne. Lucy Hampton wedd her cousin.

"Mademoiselle Lucy," he said. "I have something to ask of you."
"I will do it," Lucy promised blithely, not waiting for details.
Francois laughed. "You trust one, Mademoiselle Lucy—that is plain. Then his face became serious. "Do you remember a talk we once had together when I told you of my old playmate, Allice?"

The bride-to-be flushed furiously as she recalled that talk. Then she nodded in a matter-of-fact manner. "I remember very well," she said. "It was when I threw myself at your head and you said you didn't want me."
Francois' shoulders and hands and eyes went upward together into an eminently French gesture. "What a horror!" he cried. "What an unspeakable manner to recollect that talk! How can you? How can you be so brutal to me?"

Both of them, at that, burst into light-hearted laughter. Lucy was grave suddenly.
"But you have something to ask me, Francois. You spoke of your playmate—beautiful Allice."

"It is only you whom I could ask to do this, Mademoiselle Lucy. I have never told anyone else about her. Only you know"—the words came slowly—"of my love for her. She does not know it. Allice does not know. And I may be killed, one sees, in this fight for the prince. Quite easily. And Allice will not know. I do not like that. In fact I cannot bear it. So this is what I ask of you, dear mademoiselle. He brought out a letter and held it to her. "If you hear that I am killed, will you send it to Allice?"

Lucy took the letter and turned it over doubtfully. "I do not like this sort of post-mortem commission, Francois. I feel as if I were holding your death-warrant."

"But it is not by a bit of writing I shall meet my finish, mademoiselle. I promise not to die one minute sooner for that letter. It is only that it will make me happy to know you will send it."

So Lucy, holding the letter gingerly, agreed. But as Francois rose to go she stood by him a moment and laid her hand on his coat sleeve. "Francois—I want to tell you something."
"But yes, mademoiselle—yes, Lucy."
"It is something wrong."
"Yes—Lucy."
"I am going to tell Harry I said it."
"Yes."

"This is it, then"—and Francois, smiling, waited and there was deep silence in the big, cool, quiet drawing-room for as long as a minute. "This is it, then. I don't know how I can be so unreasonable—but I am. I love Harry—I am happy. But I am quite—jealous of Allice. And I think you are the most wonderful person I have ever known—much more wonderful than Harry. If there had been no Allice; if you had liked me—I can imagine having adored you. I do adore you, Francois. Now, how is all that compatible with my joy in marrying Harry? I don't know how it is—but it is so. I am a wicked sinful person—but it is so."

The next time Lucy Hampton saw Francois it was when, white-robed and sweet in her enveloping mist of veil she went up the chancel steps of the little Virginia country church, and looking up met a smile that was a benediction from the man whom she had loved, who stood close now at the side of her lover, her husband.

CHAPTER XXIX.

The Prince's Bright Shadow.
There are old people living in England today who remember hearing their fathers and mothers speak of a young Frenchman of uncommon personality, constantly seen with Prince Louis Napoleon during the last days of his life in London in the year 1840. Lady Constance Cecil nicknamed this Frenchman "the prince's bright shadow." There seemed to be a closer tie than brotherhood between them, and the tradition runs that the mystical prince had a superstition that his luck went with him in the person of the Chevalier Beaupre.

It was all as it should be; he was entirely happy. He had asked three wishes of the good fairies, as he had said long ago; that the prince should be emperor—that he might become a marshal of France under another Bonaparte—that Allice should love him. The first two he believed about to be realized. The last? It was not now the time to think of that. Allice had kissed him good-by. That would more than do till the fight was over. So he sped back to London, missing Pietro, but hopeful and buoyant. And in London there was a letter for him from Virginia.

"Dear Francois," Lucy began. "To think that the first letter sent to you by Harry's wife should be to tell you that she has betrayed your trust in her. I am distressed beyond words, for I have made a mistake which may mean distress to you. You remember the letter to Allice which you trusted to me to send in case anything should happen to you? I had it in my hand the week after my wedding when I had gone upstairs to get other letters for Europe which my father had commanded me to send by the next packet. And in some stupid unexplainable way I slipped yours—your precious letter—among them in place of one to my father's agents in London, and I hurried down and gave the parcel to Sambo, who was waiting to ride to Norfolk with them. And then Harry and I went away on a visit to Martin's Brandon for three days, and it was only when I came back that I discovered the dreadful mistake I had made. Can you ever forgive me? Harry and I thought over every possibility of stopping it, but there seemed to be no chance. Are you very angry with me, dear friend of Harry's and of mine?"

The letter went on with reproaches and regrets and finally slipped into a tale of a new happy life which Francois had made possible for the two.

He read it over several times. His letter to Allice, which should have been sent only after his death, had gone to her. What then? She would know that he loved her; that he had loved her always; that he would love her forever; that the one wish of his life had been that she should love herself—not Pietro. He had said that in the letter; that was all. He was glad that she should know, though he would never have told her in life. It was done and he would find out now if Pietro indeed cared for her, if she cared for Pietro. And if not, then one had waited long enough; then at last—the joy of the thought choked him. A knock came at the door of the room in the London lodging where he sat with Lucy Hampton's letter before him. Fritz Rickenbach stood there; his highness would like to see the chevalier. All personal thoughts were locked swiftly into the drawer with Lucy's letter and "the prince's bright shadow" went to the prince.

CHAPTER XXX.

The Third Wish.
On the day when Francois in London read that letter of Lucy Hampton which had awaited his return from France, a letter from Lucy Hampton reached Allice at the chateau of Viqueux. She carried it to Pietro's room where he sat in a deep chair at the window which looked over Delesmontes valley and the racing Choulte river, and the village strung on the shore. His elbow on the stone window-sill, his chin in his hand, he stared at the familiar picture.

Allice, coming in without knocking at the open door, stepped across and stood by him, and he did not lift his head, his listless eyes did not yet shift their gaze from the broad landscape.

Allice, with her head bent so that Pietro did not see her face, with her head bending lower—lower, suddenly was on her knees by the chair and her face was on Pietro's arm.

"Allice," he whispered, "what is it—what have I done?"

But the brown waves of hair with the blue ribbon tied around them lay motionless on his arm. And suddenly a thought shook him.

"It cannot be!" he gasped.

And Allice lifted her face, and the exaggerated black lashes lifted, and the blue glance lifted and rested on Pietro's black hair bent down where the light shone on the silver lines through it. Up flashed her hand impulsively, gently—as Allice did things, and touched the thick lock with an infinitely delicate caress. "Your hair—is it turning gray," she whispered in two quick breaths, and at that, in some occult fashion Pietro knew.

For moments they had no need of that makeshift language; the great house was very quiet, and one heard the horses stamping in the paved courtyard and the grooms singing, and yet one did not hear it. Distant sounds came from the village, but one only knew that long after, in remembering that morning. All they knew was that the ghost of a lifelong affection of brother and sister stood before them, changed by a miracle to a shining angel into whose face, for these first moments, they dared not look. Then slowly, exquisitely, courage came and, hand close in hand, they looked at each other astonished, glad. It was Pietro and Allice still, the ancient playfellows, the childhood friends—all the dear familiarity was there yet, but no longer were they brother and sister. And then, after a while they began to compare notes of things hidden.

"When did you begin—to like me—this way, Pietro?"

"I don't know," answered Pietro stupidly. "Does it make any difference?"

"A great deal," Allice insisted. "It's important. It's historical."
"But this isn't historical," said Pietro.

to being out and about, and then—then in a minute you will be well again."
"Oh, yes," Pietro answered without animation. "It will not be long before I am well."

"Look, Pietro," Allice held out the paper in her hand. "Such a queer letter! From Virginia. From the little Lucy Hampton of whom Francois talks. I don't understand it. Will you let me read it to you?"

"Surely," said Pietro, and waited with his unsmiling eyes on her face.

"My dear mademoiselle," Allice read. "I am writing to beg your forgiveness, as I have begged that of the Chevalier Beaupre, for the very great fault I have committed. The chevalier trusted to me a letter for which you was to have been sent only in case of a certain event; by a carelessness which, unmeant as it was, I shall never forgive myself. I gave it with other letters to our negro Sambo to be posted at once. By now it may have reached you. I cannot tell if I have made trouble or not, but in any case, I cannot rest without saying to you—as well as to the Chevalier—how sorry I am. If you can find it in your heart to forgive me, please do so, dear mademoiselle. That I should have made trouble for one as dear to the chevalier as you are is a deep grief to me. He has talked to me of you. With a very earnest prayer again for your forgiveness I am, mademoiselle, yours faithfully and sincerely.—Lucy Hampton."

Pietro looked bewildered. "What is it about?" he asked.

"I wonder," and Allice laughed and frowned at the paper in her hand. "It seems Francois wrote me a letter and left it with little Mistress Hampton to be sent in case of a certain event. What event? What a strange thing for Francois to do! And then he came to us here and said nothing of mysterious letters left cooking in Virginia. I cannot make it out, Pietro—can you?"

"Not I," said Pietro.

"The letter of Francois has not come; that is certain; I wonder if the negro Sambo lost it."

"Probably," Pietro said. "It should have come before this one, otherwise."

"It is a riddle," Allice decided, "and I never guess them." Then, dropping into a seat on the wide window-sill, "Pietro—you are letting yourself be depressed."

The gray eyes met hers with something that seemed a wall of reserve in their steady glance. "I think possibly I miss having no exercise," he said. "I will feel more natural when I can get about."

Allice looked at him. "You are eating your heart out to be with Francois," she said, and laid her hand on his.

Pietro stared as if the light touch had shaken him; then slowly his large fingers twisted lightly around the small ones, and he turned his face again, holding her hand so, to the window and the view of the valley and the river and the village. A moment they sat so, the girl's hand loose in the hollow of the man's; a slow red crept into Allice's face; there was confusion in her brain. She had laid her hand on that of her brother; her brother had taken it in his—and behold, by a witchcraft it was all changed. This delicate bit grasp that held her was not brotherly; through all her veins suddenly she knew that; the flush shot up to her eyes, to her forehead, and she tried, with an attempt at an every-day manner, to draw her hand away. But Pietro, his set pale face toward the window, his eyes gazing out, held her hand. With that the world had reeled and was whirling past her. Pietro had caught both her hands in a tight grip and had drawn them against him, was holding them there, was looking at her with a face which not even she, this time, might mistake.

"Allice," he said, "I know you don't care for me. I know you love Francois. I did not mean ever to speak, but when you put your hand on mine—"

He held her palms together and parted the palms and kissed the fingertips, first of one and then of the other, as if he kissed something holy.

"I shall never speak again, but this once I will. I always loved you—one must. I knew always that a slow silent person like me would have no chance against a fellow like Francois. So I have kept still, and it was hard. It won't be so hard now that you know. Are you angry, Allice?"

Allice, with her head bent so that Pietro did not see her face, with her head bending lower—lower, suddenly was on her knees by the chair and her face was on Pietro's arm.

"Allice," he whispered, "what is it—what have I done?"

But the brown waves of hair with the blue ribbon tied around them lay motionless on his arm. And suddenly a thought shook him.

"It cannot be!" he gasped.

And Allice lifted her face, and the exaggerated black lashes lifted, and the blue glance lifted and rested on Pietro's black hair bent down where the light shone on the silver lines through it. Up flashed her hand impulsively, gently—as Allice did things, and touched the thick lock with an infinitely delicate caress. "Your hair—is it turning gray," she whispered in two quick breaths, and at that, in some occult fashion Pietro knew.

For moments they had no need of that makeshift language; the great house was very quiet, and one heard the horses stamping in the paved courtyard and the grooms singing, and yet one did not hear it. Distant sounds came from the village, but one only knew that long after, in remembering that morning. All they knew was that the ghost of a lifelong affection of brother and sister stood before them, changed by a miracle to a shining angel into whose face, for these first moments, they dared not look. Then slowly, exquisitely, courage came and, hand close in hand, they looked at each other astonished, glad. And then, after a while they began to compare notes of things hidden.

"When did you begin—to like me—this way, Pietro?"

"I don't know," answered Pietro stupidly. "Does it make any difference?"

"A great deal," Allice insisted. "It's important. It's historical."
"But this isn't historical," said Pietro.

Allice, however, returned to the charge. "Last year—what?" Pietro asked; he had already forgotten the question.

"Oh—that I began to—mon dieu—no. Last year! Why, I think it was the day I came and saw you riding Coq."

"Oh, Pietro—you will talk only nonsense!" Allice's voice was disappointed. "But why, then, didn't you ever say so before this? We are both a thousand years old now. If you loved me"—she spoke the word in a lower voice—"why, then, were you as quiet as a mouse about it all these years?"

"I thought you cared for Francois," Pietro said simply. And added, "Didn't you?"

Allice considered. "I don't—think—I ever did, Pietro. Not really. I thought I did perhaps. He dazzled me—Francois—with his way of doing all sorts of things brilliantly, and that wonderful something about him makes everybody love him. He believed in his star; there was around him the romance of the emperor's prophecy and the romance of the career which is, we believe, about to begin now; there was always a glamour about Francois."

"Yes," Pietro agreed. "The glamour of his courage, Allice, of loyalty and unselfishness; the qualities which make what people call his charm. Francois is unlike the rest of the world, I believe, Allice."

Pietro talked on, the silent Pietro, as if delivering a lecture. He had read much and thought much; it was self-dom he spoke of the speculations which often filled his scholarly mind; today it seemed easy to talk of everything. Joy had set wide all the doors of his being. Allice opened her eyes in astonishment.

"Pietro! You are—talking like a book! But it is true; something of that sort has come to me, too—which proves it to be true. I have felt all ways that Francois had notes in him which are not on our pianos." Pietro smiled, looking at her.

"And yet, Allice, you do not love Francois, with all these gifts and all his power over hearts—but only commonplace me?"

Allice straightened against his arm. "Monsieur le Marquis Zappi, the gentleman I—care for, is not commonplace. I thank you not to say it," she shot at him, and then, melting to a sudden intensity, she put a hand on each side of his dark face and spoke earnestly. "Pietro, dear, listen. I believe I always cared for you. When I was little it hurt me to have Francois forever the one to do the daring things. Do you remember how I used to scold at you because you would not fight him?" Pietro smiled again. "Then he was captain of the school and you only a private, and I cried about that when I was alone at night. And when you went off to Italy so quietly, with never a word said about the danger, I did not know that you were doing a fine deed—I thought it a commonplace that you should go back to your country, till Francois opened my eyes."

"Francois?" Pietro asked.

"Yes. The day before he went to join you we were riding together and he told me what it meant to be a patriot in Italy under the Austrians. That day I realized how unbearable it would be if anything happened to you. But I thought I cared for Francois; if he had spoken that day I should have told him that I cared for him. But he did not; he went—and was in prison five years."

"And all that time I believed you loved him, and were mourning for him," Pietro said gently.

"I half believed it too," Allice answered. "Yet all the time I was jealous for you, Pietro, for it was still Francois who was the hero—not you. Then when there came a question of his rescue I was mad with the desire to have you do it—and you did it."

Her voice dropped. She laid her hand against his shoulder and spoke, in a quick cautious way.

"But all that is immaterial. I just love you—that's the point." A moment later she spoke again. "I want to finish telling you—and then we need never speak of it again. I did think you were—commonplace. And yet I knew in my heart you were not, for I resented your seeming so. So I urged you into danger. I wanted you to be a hero. I had that echo of a schoolgirl's romance about Francois in my mind, and I clung, all along, to the idea that I loved him and that perhaps he secretly loved me but would not say it because he was poor and a peasant; that he was waiting till his future was made. Then, one day, only the other day, he told me that he had asked three wishes of life—of the good fairies' he said. One was to make Prince Louis Emperor, one was to be Marshal of France; the third—"

she stopped.

"What?" Pietro demanded, his mouth a bit rigid.

Allice flushed and smiled and took Pietro's big hand and covered her eyes with it. "That I should—love you, Monsieur. He said he had wished that all his life."

"May heaven grant him his wish," said Pietro fervently, and then, reflecting. "It seems a strange wish for Francois. You are sure, Allice?"

"Yes, he said so," Allice insisted. "Our dear Francois," she went on softly, and the blue intensity of her eyes grew misty. "Dear Francois," she repeated, "it is only he who could have had those three wishes. The single one that was for himself was not because he cared for it himself, but because it was the Emperor's prophecy."

"I always thought," Pietro spoke slowly, "that it was not indeed for himself that he wished to be a Marshal some day, but because it might make him, in a manner, your equal. It was for you."

"For me!" Allice was astonished. "I never thought of that. I think you thought of it, Pietro, only because you cared for me—and thought Francois must care also."

"Yes, I thought he cared," Pietro considered. "I can not believe otherwise yet."

"You may believe it," Allice was firm. "For he said that what he had wished always was that I should—love you. I did it mostly to please Francois," she added serenely.

And Pietro's response to that was apt, but not to be given here. The minds of these two happy lovers were full of that third wish that had been so close always, to each of them.

"Pietro," Allice spoke earnestly, coming back to the same subject, "you know that I love Francois—of course. But you do not know in what way. I love him as if he were one of the saints—but also as if he were a helpless little child. Yet not—Pietro—as if he were—the man I love. I would give my life for him in a rush of delight, if he needed it. But I know now, whatever were my vague dreams in past years, that it is not in Francois to care for a woman as a human man."

"I am not so sure," said Pietro, and shook his head.

"You know I am not abusing our Francois," Allice protested. "Why, Pietro, my father believes, and I believe, that if affairs should so happen that he has his opportunity he may yet be one of the great characters in history. My father says he is made up of inspirations, illuminations—and limitations."

"Yes," said Pietro thoughtfully. "He has the faults of brilliancy and fearlessness. He judges too rapidly. If he were afraid ever—if he saw the other side of a question ever, his judgment would be safer. It may well happen that he will be one of the great men of Europe; it may also happen that by some single act of mismanagement he will throw away his career—or his life. God keep him safe!" Pietro said simply.

And Allice echoed it—"God keep him safe!" And then, "I am going to write him, Pietro—about us. My father knows where to reach him at Boulogne I am going to say just a word—that what he has wished for all his life is true. It will get to him the night before the battle."

"Are you sure you are right, Allice?" Pietro asked doubtfully.

"Sure," said Allice buoyantly. "Give him my love, then," said Pietro.

CHAPTER XXXI.

The Night Before.
Out in the dark, in the harbor of Boulogne, the ship Edinburgh Castle lay rocking in the wind. Prince Louis Bonaparte, who had chartered her, and the handful of his followers who had sailed with him on her from England had disembarked quietly at twilight, and in small companies had succeeded in entering the town and the quarters of the officers who were, in France, the nucleus and the hope of their attempt. In the rooms of Lieutenant Aladenize, the host of the Prince, a short council had been held to go over once more the plans which had been discussed and settled by letter for weeks already. The work was carefully arranged; there was almost nothing to be changed, and the little company of men who were trying so large a fate, scattered, with grave faces, with quiet good nights to the Prince who might tomorrow be their Emperor, to the Prince for whose sake they might tomorrow night be any or all ruined men or dead men.

He sat erect and listened. Thelin was brushing clothes with energy in the bedroom, and through another door there came a light sound of a paper turned, of a gay song sung softly. And a glow suddenly warmed the Prince's heart; here was some one who had known his mother, who had been, indeed, for a few days her son; here was some one who cared for him, he believed it, with a half-consuming flame of devotion. Since the man's arrival from Virginia six weeks before, to have him near himself had been a pleasure to Louis Bonaparte; he seemed to bring back the freshness of his early days, of the young confidence when his star shone for him, distant perhaps, but undimmed by the number used each year or where they come from? Thirty million is the total supplied to the manufacturers of the seductive weed each year. The best boxes come from Cuba and are known as Spanish cedar.

After the war with Spain the supply of this wood was greatly diminished and its price raised, so that for a time cigar dealers were obliged to find a substitute for this kind of cedar.

Various woods were tried, but trouble was found in selling these boxes, because connoisseurs insisted that a fine cigar was spoiled by putting it in any but a box made of Spanish cedar. This wood always retains the flavor of a good cigar. Indeed, some persons assert that it improves the flavor. The reason given is that it grows in the same locality.

As She Is Spoken on Clyde.
The best English is said to be spoken in Scotland—but not on the Clyde.

A Londoner, just returned from Scotland, sends a Daily Chronicle correspondent this example of Firth of Clyde language: "Poo-pa-poo; aw-ma-noo, gaur-pa-poo." The strange sounds are supposed to be uttered by a wee Macgregor in a rowing-boat with his parents; and the interpretation is, "Pull, pa, pull; oh, ma, now, gaur (make) pa pull."

The Chinese-like exhortation is a good companion for "Flaflaffary"—which is sound Glasgow for "Fellow full of a lorry."

ART OF TREE SCULPTURE

Old English Custom That Called for the Cutting of Fantastic Shapes.

Very many years ago it was the fashion of England and on the continent to have great gardens of evergreen trees trimmed and clipped into curious and fantastic shapes. To such an extent did the craze develop that these gardens were filled with crouching lions, pigs and even hens and chickens, all laboriously sculptured from living green and kept in trim by constant use of the knife and the shears.

A few of these gardens were established in this country and one still remains in perfect condition. It is located on the famous Hunnewell estate at Wellesley, Mass., and is visited by people from all over the world. The garden is on the side of a terraced hill dropping away to a beautiful little lake.

Evergreens of many kinds are to be found there and each summer a force of workmen with long ladders carefully prune and trim the branches in order to preserve the strange shapes which have been developed with the utmost patience.—Popular Electricity.

Use 30,000,000 Boxes.

Cigar boxes are a negligible quantity to the average smoker, but how many ever stopped to think of the black clouds which drove now across it. He was a bit superstitious about Francois as well, with an idea, which he spoke to no one, that a pivotal interest of his career rested in the modest figure.

He rose, this night in Boulogne, as the paper rustled and the little French provincial chanson sounded from the room where Francois Beaupre, now his secretary, had been installed, and stepped to the closed door.

"De tous cote's l'on que je suis bete," Francois sang softly. The Prince smiled. As he opened the door the singing stopped; the young man sprang respectfully to his feet, a letter grasped in his hand, and stood waiting.

"Sire!" he said.

Prince Louis fung out his hand with a gesture of impulsiveness strange to his controlled manner, yet not out of drawing to those who knew him well.

"Ah, Francois," he cried. "Let the titles go for tonight. Say, 'Louis,' as on that day when we first saw each other; when the four children played together in the old chateau ruins. And Francois smiled his radiant exquisite smile and answered quietly. "But yes, my brother—Louis." And went on, "I believe I shall not sleep tonight, Louis. I believe I am too happy to sleep."

As one reads a novel for relaxation in the strain of a critical business affair, Prince Louis caught at the distraction of this side issue. The next morning was planned to the last detail; there was nothing to do till daylight; yet he could not sleep at present. Here was a romance of some sort. He sank back on the cushions of the coach of Lieutenant Aladenize's smoking room and put his feet up luxuriously, and slowly lit a cigar of Havana.

"Tell me," he ordered, and the gentleness of appeal was in the order.

"Sire"—the young man began—and corrected himself. "Louis," he said. The Prince smiled dimly. "Since our landing I have known that a wonderful thing has happened to me. It is—"

he spoke lower—"it is the love of the woman who is to me the only one in the world."

"I congratulate you, mon ami," Louis said gently. "Is it by any chance the delightful little Mademoiselle Allice of the old chateau?"

Beaupre turned scarlet. He was a marvelous man, this Prince Louis. How had he guessed? "She loves me—I have her a letter in which she tells me that she loves me. Will his Highness read it?" With an impetuous step forward he held the paper toward Louis Napoleon.

"I thank you," the Prince said gravely. He read:

"Francois, what you have wished all your life is true. The good fairies have granted one of your wishes before the battle. That they will give you the other two on the day of the battle is the belief of your

"ALICE."

And below was written hurriedly. "Pietro sends his love."

The Prince gave back the letter with a respectful hand; then looked at Francois inquiringly. "What you have wished all your life, mon ami?" Francois laughed happily. "One must explain, if it will not tire his Highness."

And he told, in a few words, of that day when his self-restraint had given way and how, when his guard was down and he was on the point of telling his lifelong secret love, some spirit of perversity—but Francois did not know it was an angel—had caught Allice, and she had accused him of wishing always that she might love Pietro. And how, meshed in that same net of hurt recklessness, he had answered in her own manner—"Yes," he had said, "it was that which had been the wish of his life—that Allice might love Pietro!"

And Francois laughed gladly, telling the simple entanglement to the Prince, the night before the battle. "One sees how she is quick and clear-sighted, my Allice," he said. "For she knew well even then it was not that I wished."

He stopped, for in the quiet contained look of the listener an intangible something struck a chill to his delicately-poised sensitiveness. "What is it, Louis?" he cried out. "You do not think I mistake her—mistake—Allice!"

Philosopher's Purpose.
"I am looking for an honest man," said Diogenes.

"What do you want with one?" "Oh, nothing in particular. My real philanthropic purpose is to show the world how to conduct a long and restless investigation with as little expense as possible."

Dr. Kirby Wounded While Posing For Moving Picture.

Los Angeles, Cal.—Bitten by a hissing snake days ago in posing for a moving picture, Dr. William Warner Kirby, a member of Paul Rainey's expedition to Africa and well known throughout the circus world, died here. His wounds were thought to be trifling at first, but septic infection set in.
