FIGHTING BUBONIC PLAGUE IN NEW ORLEANS

Aroused by the appearance of several cases of bubonic plague, the authorities of New Orleans started a war of extermination against the rats in that city. Those that are caught are dipped in kerosene and turned over to the bacteriologists. Doctor Corput, whose portrait is here presented, is supervising the wholesale slaughter of rodents in the Crescent City.

Two deaths from the plague already have occurred in New Orleans, but the health officials are confident that they have the situation in hand and that there will be no widespread outbreak of the disease, the germs of which are carried by rats. In their efforts to prevent an epidemic they have the cooperation and advice of Surgeon General Rupert Blue, who went to New Orleans from Washington.

LIVELY LABOR SECRETARY

Secretary of Labor William B. Wilson is one of the athletic members of the president's cabinet. He jumps fences, and he doesn't care whose fences, for this picture shows him just clearing the White House fence. It happened this way. The secretary was hurrying back to his office from a cabinet meeting and upon arriving at the gate found it closed and locked. To save time he picked out a spot where the hedge was thin and gracefully leaped over. The presence of the photographer on the other side was not noticed by the secretary until he was over and the snap was made.

A Mystery. "I guess it's mere idle curiosity on my part." "Yes?" "But I can't help wondering what these polo players do when they are not playing polo."

Sure Enough. "You are late, this morning, Bridget?" said the lady to the maid. "Yes'm; I overslept myself." "But didn't your alarm clock awake you?" "No'm; it never made any noise." "Why! Didn't you wind it?" "No'm; if I have to get up and wind it in the morning, what good is it, ma'am?"

Ideal Spot. Magnate—You are late. Corporation Lawyer—Yes. I became too absorbed in a magazine article telling about the discovery of a new country in the wilds of Africa where there are absolutely no laws; nothing but thieves, cutthroats and robbers. Magnate—Fine! Incorporate our next company over there.—Puck.

His Problem. "Do you think it is a disgrace to die rich?" "I'm not worrying about that; my problem is how to be rich while I live."
