State Prohibition.

Rev. A. O. Stone, of Camp Hill, Cumberland county, spoke in the Lutheran church at Big Cove Tannery Sunday afternoon, and in McConnellsburg in the evening. Mr. Stone is one of the field men sent out by the Anti-Saloon League of the State. He is a forceful speaker, and gave his audiences some facts concerning the progress of the work of the league that was not generally known. In opposition to the thoroughly organized forces of the liquor interests, the league now has on its side ninety-eight per cent. of the railroads of the country, seventy-five per cent. of the manufacturing concerns, and practically ninety-five per cent. of the traveling salesmen of the country. Recently the leaders of labor organizations investigated the cause of disturbances that occur during strikes, and they found that in every instance, the man—or men—who started the troubles were under the influence of liquor. This has led organized labor to take steps to effectively abolish the liquor business. Rev. Stone insists that the time will be short until Pennsylvania will join the "dry" states.

Fifty independent voters of the State recently agreed to meet in convention in Harrisburg Thursday, September 17th, for the purpose of discussing the records and the platforms of thirty men who are now before the public as candidates for state and national offices. Every candidate who is not identified with the sentiments of the Anti-saloon League's plans, will be marked for defeat. No political party will be recognized; but men of known sympathy with the effort to abolish the saloons of the State will be listed, and an army of workers will be put into the field to work for their election in November.
