DOING THE MAN'S WORK

A woman engineer oiling up an engine in a London factory. No one could term this garb frivolous. This engineerwoman means business, and looks it, every inch. She is but one of many who are toiling in lowly capacities caring not how arduous or menial is the work. There are now nearly 700,000 women working in the war industries where before the war there were only 184,000. The labor problem in England has been solved to a great extent by the women who have stepped into the places left vacant by the men going off to war.

Advice to Sportsmen.

When in doubt treat your guide like a human being. Consult him from the start even in making up the grub stake; it flatters him and you may learn something.

Plan the next day's program with him, and remember that he is carrying the canoe and not you, and that it is hard work in warm weather.

If any habit needs correction, do it as near the start as possible, but in a tactful, frank way.

Don't wait until your guide has turned in and is rapidly moving into dreamland before asking him to go down to the spring for water.

Don't ask your guide to break the game and fisheries laws, or encourage him to take a wee draple too much heatherdew.

Make a chum of him and you will be rewarded.

Erie Indians.

The Iroquois, or Six Nations, Indians, were originally composed of five tribes or nations, but later the league became composed of the following: Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Senecas, Cayugas and Tuscaroras. Besides the nations mentioned, the Neutral nation, Erie, Conestoga, Nottoway, Meherrin and Cherokee were the most important tribes of the stock. When what is now Ohio was discovered by Europeans, late in the first half of the seventeenth century, the territory included within that district was mainly a battleground of numerous Indian tribes, and the fixed abode of none except the Eries, who occupied a strip along the border of Lake Erie.

It may be to get the location of foraging bands in the vicinity of the camp, or to verify rumors of the movements of the Mexican troops. It is not often that a scouting expedition has the convenience of having an auto truck with it.

The jury found that he did not wilfully upset the craft.

Pottsville will get a Carnegie Library with an endowment of $45,000 as the result of the release of control of members of the Citizens' Board, which has controlled the library since its organization in Pottsville. The control of the library has been turned over to the City School Board. In order to get the Carnegie appropriation for a public building, it was necessary to have a guaranteed annual appropriation of $4,500. The school board was advised that it could not legally make an appropriation to the library unless it had control. Some of the citizens who established the library will remain on the board, but the school directors will appoint the majority of the board of control.
