Knowledge and Success.
A taking style of advertising in the magazines just now, urges the idea that if a man wants to succeed in life, he must know more. The reader is told that if he will buy this or that encyclopaedia, dictionary, or other publication, it will so broaden his general intelligence that he will win a greater business success.

It is a striking commentary on our materialistic ideals, that people who have books of wisdom to sell feel that they must show that it will help people make more money. There was a time when knowledge was considered an end in itself, which paid as you went along regardless whether you got any richer or not.

However, there is in the business world a very distinct value placed on general information. Many a man who has good ability feels helpless and hopeless when he gets among men of good education. But it does not necessarily follow that you can give an impression of intelligence and culture merely by buying this or that reference book and consulting it frequently. The man who is constantly firing general information at his social acquaintances is a dull bore.

A thorough familiarity with what is going on in the world is quite as valuable as a business asset. If a man will faithfully read a few good newspapers and magazines, he will see the difference in his command of his own resources. Let him read thoughtful editorials, congressional and legislative debates, war and business news, and he will store his mind with interesting things.

Then when people drop chance remarks about public matters, he will be able to make some real contribution to the conversation. And a man who can talk intelligently on any general topic never lacks friends. People like to make the acquaintance of a person like that, and if he comes to them on business, they receive him with pleasure. It pays in all kinds of ways.

Money Making in Food.
A retail grocer was telling a few days ago about the opportunities to make money on the present high food prices. But he insisted that the small grocer with only a little capital is getting nothing out of it. He has to buy from hand to mouth and can't get any higher price than what he paid, plus the bare expenses of doing business.

But according to him the wholesale grocer is reaping a harvest. He quoted one jobber in a moderate sized city who he said had cleaned up $400,000 profit in one year. This man had not been doing any tremendous business only he did have a large stock of canned goods that doubled in price.

That gave him a reserve on which he could undertake large operations. On many of his deals there was practically no money passed until he gathered in his handsome profit. All he had to do was to give his I. O. U., and the goods bought on credit kept going up.

The action of food distributors in charging whatever they can collect seems pretty grasping. It is probably true that most people would not hesitate to do it. But the bulge in prices that is making one man rich, is grinding the face of the poor. The wholesaler with his $400,000 should have some sensitiveness to the welfare of the people at large. He should feel a little squeamish as he thinks of the price in human effort and privation that has been paid in order that he may enjoy his new fortune.

The people of this country will not tolerate indefinitely the making of these fortunes out of the extremity of the poor. Some way will be found in which to stop these unlimited profits. Food dealers will be wise not to aggravate public sentiment too far. If they don't want a government inspector poking into all their private accounts, and a federal commission limiting the prices they can ask, they will do well to moderate their demands.
