The Wise Choice.

The nomination of Grover Cleveland was an evidence of weakness. He had positively agreed not to run for a second term. He has done a number of insincere things during his term. He has been unfair and unfriendly to the soldiers, and his Rebel battle flag order made him enemies. He has hedged on the tariff question only for votes, when he should have been sincerely Free Trade when he said he was. His dismissal of Lord Sackville West was only a catering to the Democratic National Committee, while his Retaliation message was issued only to gain political advantage. He has not stood the scrutiny of an intelligent public, a people that can be trusted in the darkest hour of their extreme need.

When we look back over the brief campaign, we can say that the severest test applied to the brave and unsullied patriot Gen. Harrison, has resulted not only in his magnificent triumph at the polls, but also in the determined approval of a good, earnest, unselfish man for the first office in the gift of the American people. He has steadily risen in the estimation of the people since the day he was nominated. The country knew of him before as the leading Republican of Indiana, as a man who by his own steady, persevering efforts had risen to the leadership of the bar of his State and as a United States Senator whose record was without blemish.

But it remained for this campaign to reveal him to the country as a statesman of broad and comprehensive views, an orator of more than ordinary eloquence, a man who is at home with all classes of people, and, above all, with a private character beyond spot or stain. The shafts hurled at him by the enemy have fallen harmless from his shield of integrity, and all through the campaign it has been the unanimous opinion of the Republicans from Maine to California that the Chicago Convention made the wisest and most prudent choice when it selected General Harrison to lead the Republican party in the campaign of 1888. He will go into the Presidential office with the respect of all. He will prove a safe, upright, honorable President. God bless him!
