The Negro in the South.

CULLMAN, ALA., Sep. 26, 1889.
The negro in the domestic economy of the South has always been recognized as occupying an important place.

In ante-bellum days he was so interwoven into the life of the family as to be almost inseparable from it. It was Aunt Lucy who lushed the cry of the first-born in the old mansion, nursed and often nourished him at her own breast, soothed his colics and aches, taught him his first steps, his baby talk, and was even more interested in it than his mother; in his childhood pranks she was his constant companion from baby-hood to master-hood; she loved the fair haired boy far more than her own dusky offspring; and was it strange that "mammy's" jolly black face received many a child caress. Like a faithful spaniel, she lived in the pleasure of her little master, and received the tribute of the master's affection.

Again, the negro, imitative by nature, and trained with care, absorbed the helpful, courteous instincts of the plantation home, and they, as servants, were models of Chesterfield politeness. They always bowed a recognition to a stranger, who never failed to return the courtesy. The need of master and guest was answered without the asking, and a sojourn at an old family mansion, in slavery times, was a continued surprise and pleasure. In intercourse among themselves, the same manners were strictly observed, and rudeness among their children was promptly and severely punished by the parents.

Many are the stories told by the old planters, with moist eyes, of the faithfulness and affecting disinterestedness of their servants, when war and ruin stood at their doors, and food for the morrow was a question of uncertainty.

Twenty-five years have passed away, but many of the old households remain; although the girls and boys have scattered, the old planter still sits with his silver-haired companion on the broad veranda, or walks its length with uncertain steps, broken, spiritless, waiting. The painted columns by his side are cracked and rusty, the moldings at the capitals are half fallen, the bases are worn-eaten and rotten; the walks and lawns are weed-grown, the woodbine and creepers climb in wayward luxuriance, while here and there a rose bush struggles through the unkempt shrubbery. The old oaks gnarled and storm-broken look down in sympathy upon master and mansion.

The old servants are gone; no porter touches his hat at your approach or takes your horse as you put foot to ground; no dusky sibyl interprets the master's hospitality with smiling ease ere the porch is reached; no gardener hurries to place on your toilet table the fresh, fragrant bouquet. It is true, "mammy" and Uncle Joe may still sit in the door on the little cabin, crippled with age, but the old times have gone never to return, to master or servant. I doubt whether there is to-day an old planter, however broken in fortune by his loss, or saddened by contrasting the present with the past, who would wish for one moment slavery restored. Like a true patriot he now sees a future for his children and his dear South-land of the lost cause that could never have been realized under the blighting influence of human servitude.

The freedman, born and trained in slavery, are still the servants of old, faithful, industrious, patient and helpful. On these old laborers the farmers and painters are dependent for the cultivation of their land. They are hired by the year and can be depended on, generally receiving a monthly stipend from $10 to $15 per month and rations. Many of these laborers remain on the same plantation six or eight consecutive years. Were it not for this remnant of trained labor, which is fast disappearing, the agricultural interests of the South would seriously suffer. As it is, many of the crops which were formerly very profitable are now discarded, as extra labor cannot be obtained when needed.

A "ration" in Virginia, for each laborer, consists of house rent, cow-keep and garden patch, 10 lbs of bacon, 24 bushels of corn meal, and two lbs. of flour each year. There are also other perquisites which a faithful servant and his family receive.

The young men under 35 years of age show a marked contrast to the slave born population. These seldom work on the farm except by the day, stop when they choose and are independent, overbearing, lazy and do not regard promises or contracts. In the spring they generally seek railroads, mines, brick-yards or "public works," and labor under overseers, but when they return home to winter they generally spend their time in idleness. This is the element that creates the uneasiness felt in regard to the race problem. Each usually owns a revolver and shot gun, and they are rapidly forming intemperate habits. They frequent saloons and houses of disrepute, indulge in frequent quarrels among themselves, and statistics show that crime among them is rapidly on the increase.

In the household in old times, Dinah was the genius of the kitchen, no intruders were allowed in her domain; she often carried the keys of the store-room and watched its resources as her own. She felt a pride in order and tidiness, and in the delicate relishes for master's table. The festivities of a social gathering was a state occasion for the servants, of which Aunt Dinah was master of ceremonies.

The modern kitchen of the South can boast of but few Dinah's, those left live in the little cabin with the old man, who does "chores for Massa" on the old place. The kitchen now occupied by those whose chief study is to shirk work and duty, and determine the amount of "toll" they can levy upon the table supplies, and not bring down the wrath of the mistress. This "toll" is distributed among hungry, idle, gaping relatives, who consider a position of cook at the "big house" for mother, sister or daughter, a bonanza for the family.

To-day the biscuits are short in quantity, to-morrow the butter lacks in supply, the lard jar, unlike the widow's cruse, is often empty, the sugar fails to find its way into the cake, to the disgust of the guests, and weak tea or coffee surprises as well as mortifies the hostess. The mistress may call her cook to account, but is met with the prompt "Missus, I does the best I can, if I can't suit you alls, better get some one else," well knowing, as does the mistress from experience, that change will bring no relief. The only remedy is the lock and key, the giving out in the morning the supplies for each meal.
