Clay Eaters of the South.

CULLMAN, Ala., Feb. 1, 1890.

There are several sections of North Carolina, South Carolina and Alabama, where there is found a species of kaolin called "Terra Alba," which is largely used for adulteration by candy manufacturers, and which is found in all cheap confectionery. Its deleterious effect upon the system is known to all, but yet for the sake of a few cents per pound, manufacturers use it and children are allowed to eat it. In the vicinity of these clay beds live a class of people called "clay-eaters," because they have formed the habit of eating this clay, not from any nourishment it contains, or that it allays hunger, but probably from pure habit which is handed down from parent to child. The injurious effects are evident in their lank forms, sallow complexion, and they all invariably suffer from chronic indigestion. The men, women, and even children seem prematurely old and lack in physical development. Intellectually there seems to be a deficiency that can hardly be accounted for by their isolation or habits of life.

They reside in sparsely settled communities on the poor clay hills, generally own a few acres of almost worthless land, with a log cabin containing seldom more than two rooms, each of which is supplied with a rude fireplace, which serves all the purposes of domestic convenience, warmth, cookery, light, a spittoon and receptacle for all kinds of dirt.

When questioned as to a reason for eating clay, they reply, "grandpa and grandma allus eat it, an' we uns eat it too." As little children are allowed to eat it, the taste is doubtless acquired.

These poor people were isolated to themselves during slavery, and were despised, even by the slaves, hence they have lived for generations in a semi-barbaric state.

Their entire personal property consists of an ox or a mule, a cow or two, and the crudest agricultural implements. They cultivate a little "crap" of cotton or tobacco with which to purchase the few articles of necessity which they are unable to produce. Hunting and fishing, and a few "razor-backs" that roam wild in the woods furnish their meat, and the corn and sweet potato patch their bread. Here they were born, have lived, and will die contented with the fortune and ignorance of their fathers.

These people are exceedingly superstitious. All their acts are controlled or guided by signs or warnings. The different phases and appearance of the moon, to them is a matter of the greatest importance.

Corn is planted when the moon is full, potatoes are put in the ground in the dark of the moon. They will not kill a beef or a pig in the wane of the moon, because it will shrink in the cooking. If there is a ring around the moon in which there are three bright stars, then in three days it will be sure to rain, and no journey or job of work will be commenced. The number of stars included in the ring always determines the number of days that will elapse before a storm. When the new moon lays on its back, dry weather may be expected, if it stands on end so that a hunter cannot hang his powder horn on it, then a wet spell is sure to follow.

Noises at night made by wild or domestic animals, all have a significance. The hoot of an owl is especially an omen of ill luck, and if answered by the hoot of a dog, it is a sign that a member of the family will soon die. It is customary as soon as the hoot of an owl is heard, to overturn a chair or make some other noise to break the charm and avert the threatened danger. The howling of a dog or the mewling of a cat at night, when not answered by the owl, is significant of ill, but not of serious fatality.

A large piece of flint kept in every fireplace is supposed to secure poultry from depredations by foxes and owls, and a brood of chickens is protected from hawks by holding a sieve over it for a few moments as soon as it leaves the nest. In case this does not protect, the hen is pronounced "unlucky" and is condemned to the pot.

"Never turn back without making a cross mark on the ground with the right heel," is an admonition they never disregard. If a rabbit crosses their path when just starting on a journey, no matter where, it is at once abandoned, for to go on would only be to neglect the warning of death.

They implicitly believe in the magic power of the "left hind foot" of a rabbit killed in a graveyard, and each clay-eater carries one suspended around his neck under his clothes, with as much faith and reverence as ever a reclusé clung to the rosary and crucifix.

To kill or move a cat is bad luck and no one who disregards this custom will ever prosper.

If an axe or other edge tool, or even a spade or shovel is carried into a room it must be carried out of the door through which it was brought in, otherwise it will be the cause of the death of some one of the family. All dirt, or crumbs from the table must be swept into the fire and not out of doors, to prevent "luck" from going out also.

The children are educated to believe in these signs and traditions, and should a stranger express a doubt, he will at once be overwhelmed with proof as strong as "holy writ," for "didn't gran-pa, gran-ma, Uncle Nathaniel or Aunt Jernsha, have warnin' time an' agin', an' didn't they tell we uns themself?"

These people do not number over five or six hundred families, residing in sections remote from the civilizing influences of towns, churches and schools. With the tenacity of ignorance they cling to their superstitious traditions, which will only disappear before the onward march of intelligence.

Our Jury System.

Chief Justice Ewing, of Kansas, in an address before the bar association of that state at Topeka, made a strong argument against the requirement of unanimous of the judgement of juries in civil cases. Abolishing this requirement would be a radical beginning in the work of jury reform, in favor of which there appears to be unanimous sentiment.

Justice Ewing maintains that unanimity of opinion in either a small or large body of men upon any question presented, reinforced by the best evidence that the methods of the lawyer can extort, must perforce be forced. A jury of twelve is similarly situated. Twelve men gathered promiscuously cannot, he says, agree upon the simplest question that may turn up. How can they do better when confronted by the great responsibility imposed by the majesty of the courts.

Judge Ewing maintains that justice can only be done by a system that will allow a juror to judge as an individual. He takes the evidence of the several witnesses. He knows, if he is a qualified juror, as much of the individual case as a lawyer in his special plea can tell him, and to hold a jury of qualified men until they come each to the same opinion is a barbarism. The finding is forced, and the most persistent, stubborn, determined man is the jury, and directs the findings of the body. Jurists everywhere wherever they have expressed an opinion favor the majority judgement of a jury, upon the ground that it is more likely to be just. This is a reasonable view. The general purpose of man is to be fair and just. Forced by the rules of court to come to a decision he is as likely to go astray in his judgement as to come to proper conclusions, and under such conditions the conscientious juror prefers to disagree with his colleagues, and a failure of the purposes of exact justice is the consequence.

There is need of reform in our jury system, and it seems to be in the direction of a majority decision.
