

An Heroic Engineer.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Feb. 27.—Heroically facing a most horrible death in plain sight of fifty people, Dominick R. Thorpe, a North Pennsylvania Railroad engineer, yesterday, snatched Willie Tamplin, aged 6 years, from beneath the ice-covered surface of a deep pond, at Fairhill Station, and almost perishing with cold, was brought ashore with his nearly dead charge.

The child, whose parents reside at No. 1210 North Twenty-seventh street, Philadelphia, on Sunday visited the family of Eugene Small, at No. 2974 Leithgow street. Late in the afternoon three of the latter's children and the little visitor started from the house for a walk. They went toward the railroad, which is close by, and for a time watched the passing trains, finally starting to return home at 6 o'clock.

At Fairhill Station the tracks of the North Penn and the Reading Roads cross, and in the angle the workmen in making excavations for the embankment left a deep hole. Water fully fifteen feet deep has collected there, covering nearly an acre of ground. This pond the children discovered as they walked along, and one of them tossed a stick out on the thin ice that covered the surface. Willie wanted to recover it and started to walk toward it.

When fully twenty yards from the shore the treacherous ice, weakened by warm sun, suddenly broke beneath his weight and in a twinkling the helpless child was foundering in the ice-cold water. His little companions shrieked with terror, but could render no aid and he slowly sank, reappearing the next instant and partially grasping the edge of the ice to sustain himself.

The thunder of freight train No. 45 on the North Penn tracks running east under full steam drowned the cries of the children, but Engineer Thorpe, from his seat in the cab, saw the struggling boy and understood the situation. Three sharp blasts of the whistle sounded "down brakes" to the crew, and then closing the throttle and crowding back the reverse bar Thorpe jumped from his engine before it scarcely slacked speed.

He rather than ran down the steep embankment and throwing aside his coat and cap jumped to the rescue. The ice that had sustained the little boy for twenty yards gave way under the heavy man at his first step and he was in the deep water. Swimming and fighting he kept hammering with both fists at the stroke the rotten ice ahead, and finally mashing and crushing a channel for himself toward the hole through which the child had an instant before disappeared. Others now reached the edge of the pond, but all seemed petrified with fright.

Not ceasing for an instant his efforts Thorpe at last broke through to the hole on which all eyes were centered. Diving into the water, in a few seconds he rose with the unconscious and almost dead child in his grasp.

His fellow trainmen had by this time secured a ladder from Fairhill station and forming a line succeeded in reaching its end to the fast swimming engineer. He grasped the end firmly and with his senseless burn was drawn ashore. Willing hands took the child and rushed to the home where Dr. Laughridge, after work, restored consciousness and afterward pronounced the patient out of danger.

The exhausted but still conscious engineer, was hurried to a Reading car and once aboard all speed was made for Kensington avenue hospital. Patrol No. 19 was there to meet the engine, and Sergeant Winter carried Thorpe to the wagon. He had become unconscious because of the heat of the blazing engine furnace, and animation was almost entirely suspended. Two minutes later he was laid on a cot in the Episcopal Hospital.

Forced respiration, hypodermic injections of quinine and the application of hot water bags the flicking spark of life in the engineer's body was revived, and he finally recovered consciousness. Last night he was able to talk a little, and when asked about the rescue whispered: "I could not see the poor child drown."

Thorpe is 25 years of age and lives at No. 1222 East Cambria street. The physicians say that he will entirely recover in a few days. In the neighborhood of the accident and rescue no other was heard last evening but the highest praise of the engineer's bravery, and the story was told over and over again.
