

in the country that does not contain some unworthy members. But who thinks of measuring the churches by an occasional hypocrite or thief that is developed among them? Who but characterless scoundrels trying to make out that everybody else is as vile as themselves, enlarge constantly on the number of thieves, hypocrites, usurers, etc., in the churches, and ignores wholly the honest, God-serving men and women who really make up the congregations?

It is in this manner that our enemies treat us. They are so much taken with some one man in a company who skulked and malingered, that they cannot think of the other ninety-nine who did their duty bravely and faithfully. They will insist that the one coffee-cooler is the best representative of the entire company, and one cannot speak of the grand deeds of the ninety-nine, but they will straightway bring up the shameful performances of the one discreditable member.

Every admission by a comrade that there were scoundrels in the army is eagerly snapped up by the pension-haters, to support their allegations that the army was mainly composed of this class.

We do not want any rascal's character whitewashed, or a hero made out of a coward, but we can insist that the men who really sacrificed, fought and endured shall be properly appreciated and honored; that they shall be kept in the public eye, and not all the attention directed to the insignificant fraction which acted discreditably.

There is a higher motive in this than mere self-glorification. It is a matter involving national honor and manhood. The valor of the nation's sons on the battlefield is a precious heritage to every country. It is something that idealizes and ennobles the national character. The pension-haters are doing their utmost to destroy this and debase us in the eye of the world and of future generations as a people who in a great crisis sent into the field only a horde of mercenaries who, with rare exceptions, were shameless cowards, intent upon shirking any duty or danger that they could evade.—National Tribune.
