There was a child dead in the house. A girl of seven or eight whose deformity had not allowed her to be as other children. She looked out and saw them at play—looked out and saw them at play—giving this Remedy in large and freshouse. heard them tell of the streets and quent doses, as it contains nothing injurious. 50 cent bottles for sale by g. M. Shindel, Middleburgh, and J. and green woods which her eyes had W. Sampsel, Penns Creek, never looked upon. Almost helpand wondered what it was like, and when she awoke at night and caught sight of the twinkling stars through her window she grieved and wept because she could not go forth and walk to and fro and know that they walk to and fro and know that they were looking down upon her. One time-one time when she sat on the doorstep and saw a lad of the street crush a poor, homely flower beneath his heel-a flower which some one had thrown away in passing-she her he had promised to some day bring her a store of them.

But on this day, when the undertaker had placed his emblem of death on the door he passed that way and was told that little Katie, the cripple, was dead. Then he remembered what had happened in the long ago-how she had cried out as if stabbed in the heart, how his promise had comforted her. He walked slowly away-up one street and down another -on and on, until by and by he saw flowers by the roadside. They were simple flowers-chilled by the frosts and faded by the drear winds of autumn. Men smiled as they saw him gather them. Women and children wondered and smiled as they saw him carry them through the streets of
