

Jay Gould's Daughters.

Two of Jay Gould's daughters have joined the law class in a New York university, with the intention of taking a thorough course. These young ladies do not propose to practice law. They are worth many millions of dollars, and they are able to live in absolute idleness and devote themselves to the pursuit of pleasure all the remainder of their days. But they want something to occupy their minds—a study that will give them mental discipline, and as they are large property owners they desire to know all about the laws relating to personality and real estate so that they will run less risk of being defrauded by their agents and others. This is commendable, and it would be well for other rich and well-to-do women to follow the example of the great millionaire's daughters. The study of law is attractive to all persons of bright intellect, and thousands of people of both sexes who have no idea of making it their profession would be benefited in many ways if they could master about a dozen legal textbooks and familiarize themselves with court proceedings and with the forms of legal documents. In this country even the rich are unwilling to be idle. They all want to engage in some occupation, and if they do not go into business or into a profession they turn their attention to some special study. This characteristic of our people is rapidly widening the field for women, and their opportunities for making themselves independent are improving every day. The fact that Jay Gould's daughters are studying law, although they are able to live without a profession, will encourage many other less fortunate young women to equip themselves for the bar as a means of earning their living. If they do this and clients are willing to patronize them, what opportunity can be offered?
