[Inc.] CHICACO. last she was lost to him in a throng far looked with a curious, ingenuous wonder at some Inca drawings which were in the corner on the wall.

He did not observe that the noise of voices grew less and less, and then ceased altogether. He was lost in a dream of Her until suddenly he was awakened by the electric lights going out altogether and the sound of a key turning in the lock of the door. He listened acutely then, and heard the gay voices growing fainter outside, as the guests went along the Chinese lanterned path into the house to supper He started out of his corner to rush for the door and try to make somebody hear him. But he entangled himself among the portfolio stands with a loud noise, and when he extricated himself and felt cautiously round in the dark ness for landmarks he found that he had lost his bearings. The sounds outside died away.

He stood still and wondered what he should do. And where was She? What more worthy man was handing her to supper? His teeth came together at the thought. It had been his one final daring hope, to take her into supper this very last time-and then retire to vegetate and slowly die in the empty country. And even this had been denied him. He felt a chair near and sat heavly down.

Then his sharpened senses seemed

- "I don't know where anything is." "I do."
- "What?"
- "You," he said, simply.

"That's an idea," she said, as if it were an agreeable one.

"What? How?" he cried, in delight. Was it possible, then, that he had ideas without recognizing them?

"If we find each other we shall at any rate have found something."

He was speechless. Then he said, almost trembling.

"May I come to you?"

"Y-e-es," she said. And well might she hesitate in that heavenly, dainty way, he thought. To find him was but a poor hope for her, even if to find her was to him just everything.

He heard again the soft rustle.

"Are you coming to me?" he asked, incredulous of his joy.

"Of course. I must meet you half way."

"If you could-Oh, if you would-" "I am doing it," she said, and laughed softly again.

He heard several bumps and noises close to his own knees and shins and supposed that he was making them with his own person, but he could not take account of that when she was "comaway at the other end of the room. He | ing half way." Next moment his hand turned his back on everybody, and grasped a soft one, put out to feel its way. Before he or she could stop he had touched her, herself, and his nostrils caught up the scent of her hair. She withdrew from him with a soft surprised "Oh!"

He, too, could only echo the "Oh." and the hand loosed itself from his longing hand that dared not keep it. Neither spoke for awhile. He feared he should never be forgiven, and even furiously wished that he had written something. Then he would have had a right at least to want to touch her. "I think I am standing near the table where the candle was," she said faintly at last.

He found his matchbox in humble silence. There was only one match in it. and he struck it. It turned out to be the wrong table, but he succeeded in bringing the match alight to the candle. though he really did not see it. He only saw her. She was pale, he thought. She must be very angry. The candle had been, so it happened, pinched with a wet finger the night before. It sputtered and epat in a vixenish manner and went angrily out. The match, too. There was silence again.

"Well, we saw how we were standing." she said. Her voice was very low. Yes." so was his.

"But I don't seem to remember-" "Nor do I!"

Another silence.

"Hundreds." Penwin laid hold hard of the edge of her chair. "But you mustn't mind so much. Indeed, you mustn't, dear Mr. Penwin. Everybody begins by being refused. Please don't mind so."

"How can I help?" he demanded, almost with a sob.

She put out a ministering hand and it met his cheek, which was bowed down. There was a tear on it. He seized the hand and kissed it, and then. they neither of them knew how, he was on his knees by her side.

"Make up to me for it-a little," he said. "It is as hard as death."

"After all," she said, by and by, in a new voice, "somehow I should not have thought you were a writing man." "Why not?"

"You don't look like it, you know. "I don't," he admitted, miserably.
