

The Cure that Cures
Coughs, Colds, Grippe,
 Whooping Cough, Asthma, Bronchitis and Incipient Consumption, is

OTTO'S CURE
 the GERMAN REMEDY
 cures throat and lung diseases.
 Sold by all druggists. 25¢ & 50¢.

A good looking horse and poor looking harness is the worst kind of a combination.

Eureka Harness Oil
 not only makes the harness and the horse look better, but makes the leather soft and pliable, puts in condition to last—twice as long as it ordinarily would.

Give Your Horse a "Chance!"

GUARANTEED $900 Yearly SALARY

Men and women of good address to represent us, some to travel appointing agents, others for local work looking after our interests. $900 salary guaranteed yearly; extra commissions and expenses, rapid advancement, old established business. Grand chance for earnest man or woman to secure pleasant, permanent position, liberal income and future. New, brilliant lines. Write at once.

NEW FORD PRESS
 23 Church St., New Haven, Conn.
 8-21-18.

WRITERS CORRESPONDENTS or REPORTERS

Wanted everywhere. Stories, news, ideas, poems, illustrations, advance news, drawings, photographs, unique articles, etc., etc., purchased. Articles revised and prepared for publication. Books published. Send for particulars and full information before sending articles.

The Bulletin Press Association, New York.

His Brother's Keeper;

or Christian Stewardship.

BY CHARLES M. SHELDON,
 Author of "In His Steps," "The Crucifixion of Philip Strong," "Robert Hardy's Seven Days," "Malcolm's Kirk," etc.

"That's right!" exclaimed Rhena, her eyes flashing. "Eric knows better than to talk that way. Think what these men have missed all their lives! Surely it will be very little for some of them to enjoy, the best we can do. And as to the time they are underground, Stuart, put your brains to work to bring about a condition of labor so that the men can have more leisure and see more of God's earth when the sun shines on it."

"Hear, hear!" cried Andrew. "Bring me, says Aladdin to the slave of the lamp, 30 golden dishes full of pearls and as many more full of diamonds."

"What she asks is apparently impossible now," responded Stuart, "but why should it always be so? Why should so many thousands of human beings dig in the ground, in the dark, in constant and deadly peril, shut out from most of the pleasures of the earth, in order that other men like me may have a more comfortable time?"

"Because they don't know how to do anything else and would not if they could," said Eric bluntly.

"You don't know that, Eric. You only think so because they never have done anything else."

"Well, some one must do mining. Humanity needs iron for its civilization, and how is it going to get it if some of us don't go down into the earth and dig it out? Shall we take turns around? Suppose we try that? I'll go down this week, and next Andrew will take my place while I preach for him, and the next week Stuart can—"

"Yes, that would be a fine plan," said Rhena. "Next you would be wanting me to go into the mines and serve my week. And I would be willing." Rhena added in a deep sadness which sometimes fell upon her, "if I thought it would help to solve any problem and make life a greater and more blessed reality to thousands of souls than it is now. How little we seem to be doing to answer the question after all! We need more wisdom, and, dear friends, we have not gone to the eternal source of all strength and truth as we should.

Before we talk over our plans any longer don't you think we ought to pray awhile?"

The request was so simply and naturally put that the rest at once, as they sat about the table, bowed their heads while Rhena prayed. Andrew followed, then Eric, and lastly Stuart. They were straightforward petitions for wisdom and a larger knowledge of God's will. The somewhat foggy atmosphere of the discussion seemed to clear up after that little pause while they talked with their Father, and the rest of the afternoon they seemed to feel that whatever mistakes they might make, and however short they might fall of answering any real problems, their hearts and wills were asking for divine wisdom, and their great purpose was to use all talents and all property for the uplift of humanity.

About 4 o'clock, as Eric and Andrew were getting up to go, the doctor came in to see Louise. He had come into the house without being noticed and had entered the library just as Stuart was saying: "It will be a splendid thing for the doctor. It will keep him busy, but he won't be exposed any longer to these terrible rides over the range in winter."

"If you are talking about the plan of turning this house into a hospital and shutting me up in it the rest of my life, you're wasting your time and breath," said the doctor gruffly. "I simply won't do anything of the kind. I can't live without fresh air."

The doctor looked grimly at the little group about the table. It was raining hard, and he had come in dripping. He was going to lay off his wet coat in the hall before going to see Louise, but as he stood there he looked as if he ought to be very comfortable. The water had run from the brim of his hat down upon his right ear, and what semblance of a collar he had on when he started out had melted away down his neck under the folds of his great coat.

"But, doctor, why don't you have more sense, as you say to the rest of us today? We're getting too old, doctor, to expose yourself to another winter."

"Did you ever know me to take my death cold?"

"And this place we are arranging for you," continued Stuart, "will be a comfortable berth for you the rest of your life. You're getting too old, doctor, to expose yourself through another winter."

"I'm not such an old fool as to be cooped up in a hospital yet. Who will look after the men outside if I stay here all the time?" the doctor asked stubbornly.

"Why, we can get a man all right. There are plenty of young doctors who are eager to begin practice here."

"Yes," burst out the doctor, "young upstarts who have a lot of newfangled surgical instruments and are eager to try every one of 'em on every case they get—anything from rheumatism to liver complaint! I was talking with one of 'em last winter, and he wanted me to swallow his latest contraption for operating on the throat with an electric searchlight and battery combined, and I don't know what all! What'll become of my people if these fellows are turned loose on 'em with their inventions? No, sir; I don't intend to turn 'em over to any such risks! Mines and providence are dangerous enough, but a new doctor with a lot of brand new instruments is too much even for Champion men."

"But you are all the time grumbling about the hard work, and when we arrange a good, easy place for you you won't take it," said Stuart, firing a parting shot as the doctor started toward the hall.

"Good, easy place! Stuart, you know I'd rather die from tumbling, Ajax and all, into an old shaft on my way to set Lew Trethven's leg the nineteenth time than petrify dead in the best hospital on earth!" retorted the doctor.

It is possible he will die that way some time, for under no persuasions would he consent to abandon his outdoor work on the ranges. After all, was it not out there that the doctor felt the love of humanity and its hunger for love? And nothing could ever satisfy him except that. The thought of turning over the people of his "parish," as he sometimes called it, to strangers, was a thought he could not endure. He had cared for them too long, and please God, he said to himself often as he tumbled through drifts and waded through gorges, he would still claim the privilege of calling them names and loving them.

So the short summer went swiftly by, and Stuart's plans matured so far as the building was concerned, but he confronted some new problem every day. It required all his growing steadiness of purpose, together with all of Rhena's great love for him, to keep him calm and hopeful. It was not such an easy matter to use God's money for the good of the people who were most in need of it. He had talked over a plan of profit sharing with Eric and some of the other miners, and it was one of many plans he determined to try in the near future. He was being hindered in his efforts to exercise what he had come to call his stewardship by the very men he was most eager to help. Many of the miners would not consent to any improvement in their cabins, and did not take kindly to Stuart's attempt at drainage. Added to all the rest was the ever present factor of the saloon, which never passed in its work of destruction, and stood as a constant force to tear down any and every good work.

But as the fall came on and the great building began to take form and the possibilities of the future for Champion grew upon him Stuart settled one fact very firmly and without vagueness. Whatever his plans might be and however much he might stumble and make mistakes in the days to come, he knew that his use of money or brains or property or whatever he possessed was a use the account of which he owed to God. He was fully persuaded that his stewardship was a sacred thing and a very vital part of his Christian faith, and he finally had a feeling of great peace as he rested on the conviction that he had dedicated all possessions to unselfish purposes for the good of humanity as far as God gave him strength and wisdom to work out the details. The special ways and means by which he was to dispense God's money was a matter which must be left to experiment and trial. The way in which the money should be used was not an important thing in comparison with his entire willingness to use it as his brother's keeper. He argued, and rightfully, that if men of capital once acknowledged that they were God's stewards and once were willing and eager to use money and talents to the glory of God's kingdom in the earth it would not be a difficult thing to find how best to do it. If a man wants to do God's will, the way to do it will very soon be found. The great need is that the man should first be eager to do the will.

The home he was building for Rhena and himself was built with the same idea which now pervaded his entire life. It was built for a home, but in such a way that its use would bless all Champion. If you visit Champion some day very soon, you will understand this better. No one can ever charge Stuart and Rhena with selfish or needless luxury. But every cent used in the building of their home was spent as if they were planning to receive as their most honored guest the Lord Jesus Christ and offer him a restful hospitality after a weary day spent in the world.

That was a memorable day in the history of Champion when the Hall of Humanity was completed. The miners had a holiday, and all day long the building was thronged in all its parts by the men and their families. In the evening Stuart had planned, with the help of Andrew and Eric, to have some exercises in the nature of dedicatory services in the great hall. He had gone down early, leaving Rhena with Louise, who had been more restless than usual that day. She had, as the doctor thought she might, lingered on through the summer, gradually falling. No one had noted her condition more carefully than Rhena. She staid with her until she became quiet, and at last left her in charge of a nurse and went down to join Stuart at the hall.

The miners' band had been preparing for some time, at Stuart's request, to take part on this occasion. They marched into the hall early and took a position on the platform. The Salvation Army also proudly beat its way up the broad aisle, headed by the major, who, while in doubt as to the expediency of moving into his new quarters without first breaking some of the furniture to make things look just right, had finally consented to try it as it was, and if it was too good, Stuart had arranged for the lease of the old army hall again.

No one had noted her condition more carefully than Rhena.

The doctor had been caught after a long chase up into the hills, and Stuart had insisted on his being on the platform, but could not prevail on him to offer any remarks.

"I'm no speaker. Don't ask me, Stuart. If any of the audience are sick or feel bad after you and Eric and Andrew have talked to 'em, I'll do my best for 'em; but I would only perform an operation on their skulls without using an anesthetic if I tried to talk. It would be too painful for us all. I'll agree to yell at any good points the rest of you make, if I can see 'em without a microscope."

Andrew spoke briefly on the value of the building and its opportunities for Christian service, dwelling on the fact that it was not money that would make the plan successful, but live Christian men and women, who put their hearts into the work that the hall was to represent.

Eric followed with a very strong speech. He was coming out of his disappointment and bitterness, and was almost as popular with the men as before. If he develops he will be a stronger leader than he once ever thought of being. He declared his intention of still remaining where he was in the mines. At the close he took advantage of his opportunity to say some beautiful things of Stuart.

Stuart was the last speaker, and it was an occasion of a lifetime for any man. He was profoundly moved as he faced that audience. It was the same audience he had seen at the meetings in the square, at the railroad station, at the park and in the hall at De Mott, the same rough, stolid, impassive crowd, with here and there a face that lighted up at some human touch as Andrew and Eric had moved it. It was the same, and yet it was different. To Stuart it spoke of opportunities. He saw humanity so differently now.

He spoke well; very simply and in many fashion. Rhena, proud and happy, felt that admiration for this strong, handsome man, her husband, which always adds to the depth and beauty of the love of man and wife. More than once the tears came as she listened to the way Stuart talked, voicing in a very plain fashion his great desire for the common brotherhood. The men listened with the most breathless interest. When he finished, there was a hearty cheer, which was caught up again and again, while Stuart, overcome by his feelings, sat back and covered his face with his hands.

It seemed a very natural thing then for Rhena to ask all to bow their heads during a prayer. It seemed to the people that nothing could more fitly close such a day and such an occasion than Rhena herself kneeling there, with all the Salvation Army kneeling, as they used to do, around her. She had never prayed so earnestly and truly for the life abundantly to be given to them all. Even while Rhena was still upon her knees, the audience, without knowing all the reason for it, felt that this building was consecrated in a very solemn and profound sense to the humanity in honor of which it was named. And Andrew, seeing that the time had come to close the services, pronounced the benediction.

At the same hour in which Rhena had knelt down before that great silent crowd of miners the doors of the drawing room in Aunt Royal's mansion in New York were being thrown open to one of the first events of the society season. There were gathered the butterflies of the world, diamonds and silks, sweet music and laughter; vanity of vanity, adorned with the impressive power always apparent in a display of rich leisure, danced and ate and drank and gossiped as if the world was all play and the main business of every man and woman was to be as free from trouble and sacrifice as possible. Aunt Royal was at her best; the trip abroad had given her jaded nerves a needed repose and she was ready now for another season of gaiety.

"By the way," asked a young man during the evening, who had been abroad several months, "where is that charming niece of yours, Louise Duncan, who used to visit you occasionally?"

Aunt Royal paled a little. "You did not know she is quite an invalid? Yes, she is living with her brother in Champion. It is doubtful if she survives the winter. The winters in Champion are horrible. I spent one there and it nearly killed me."

"Ah, we are thankful it was only one winter. How could we have spared you here in New York?" was the gallant reply.

Aunt Royal smiled at the compliment, and the gay company, its elegance, its flowers, its perfume, its happy carelessness of the world's woe, almost shut out the picture of that agonizing figure that kneeled one night over these close by that beautiful woman at the piano and begged for— But strike up the music faster, faster! Let us eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow we die.

The musicians at Aunt Royal's had begun the soft, dreamy waltzes just as Stuart and Rhena came into the library of the Duncan house at Champion. They had been sent for in haste by the nurse, who had noted a serious change in Louise as the evening drew on. They went at once into the bedroom.

It did not need the doctor's presence already there, nor the stern look on his face, to tell them that the end was near. Louise was partly raised on pillows, and her eye glowed with the fever of madness that had all along been consuming her.

"Come!" she cried peevishly. "we shall be late. Don't you hear the clock striking?" It made every one in the room start to hear the great clock in the hall just at that moment strike 11.

"Come, give me my gloves and fan, and let Jim to drive around at once. Be careful of my dress! Do I look right? The dances will be started. We shall miss the first. How slow you are! I wanted lilacs of the valley, and you sent up the freisias. I don't think they are a bit pretty. Doctor, you said not to leave off my cloak when I went out to the carriage. It seems cold! What is the matter? Hark, I hear the music! Why don't they play faster? It is not fast enough."

She opened her eyes and saw what she had not seen before. "Aunt Royal! Hal! I am going mad! I am mad! Doctor, doctor, save me!"

She fell back, and the doctor shuddered and for a second buried his face in his hands. Stuart never saw him do that before. When he lifted his head, no one asked what the end would be, for it had already come. She had died, as the doctor had really supposed she would, suddenly and painlessly. Her life had gone out like a candle flame in a winter night, when the great door of the mansion was swiftly opened and the belated owner of the house is met by the servant in the hall.

"Tell the musicians to play a little faster," said Aunt Royal a few minutes later, and they did so.

When morning began to come in gray and cold, Stuart was standing by the window of the bedroom as he had stood about a year before when his father died. Louise lay there, now that the life had gone, her face almost as beautiful as when Stuart saw her on his return from Europe. The jewels were still about her neck and the bracelets on her wrists, while the freisias of which she had complained lay across her bosom.

Stuart was looking out of the window. A crowd of miners had come down the road and was standing silently in front of the mansion. He felt them there, and even in his respected their purpose in coming early to show their sympathy when they went on down to the hall. He went out to the b

"Tell the men to come up. I shall be glad to thank them," he said to a servant.

Rhena came in. "God has given you to me," he said, "else this would be more than I could bear," and he stood thus with his arm about her, and the tears of his humanity fell fast at the sight of that pale clay on the bed.

Then he turned toward the hall with his wife.

"God is merciful," she said. "He has given us something to live for. We will spend our all in doing his will."

"Yes," replied Stuart, "humanity, after all, is worth saving. It is worth living for. We are our brothers' keepers. There is nothing better in all the world than the love of God for his children, and the love of his children for one another." And with the words he went out and shut the door upon the dead and its past, and with the woman of his love by his side faced the living and its future.

THE END.

Her Antelope.

Stalking antelope among the Rockies may have its humorous as well as its thrilling side. Says Mrs. Seton-Thompson in "A Woman Tenderfoot."

We tied our horses on a dizzy height, and stole, Nimrod with a carbine, I with a rifle, along a treacherous, shaly bank which ended 20 feet below in the steep, rocky bluffs that formed the face of the cliff.

A misstep would have sent us flying, but I did not think of that. My only care was to avoid startling the shy, fleet footed creatures we pursued. I hardly dared to breathe. Every muscle and nerve was strained with long suspense.

Suddenly I clutched Nimrod's arm and pointed at an oblong, tan colored bulk 50 yards above us on the mountain.

"Antelope! Lying down!" I whispered.

Nimrod nodded and motioned me to go ahead. I crawled nearer, inch by inch, my gaze riveted. It did not move. I grew more elated. It was not so hard to approach an antelope after all. I felt astonishingly pleased at my performance. Then rattle! crash! and a stone went bounding down. I raised my rifle to get a shot before the swift animal should go flying away.

It was strangely still. I stole a little nearer and then turned and went gently back to Nimrod. He was convulsed with silent laughter. My elaborate stalk had been made on a nice buff stone!

Guessing a Cliff's Height.

Shortly after making the turn to the east and in the depths of a beautifully terraced canyon along the Rio Grande, writes Robert T. Hill in The Century, we came upon a copious hot spring running out of the bluff upon a low bench, where it made a large, clear pool of water. The sight of this natural bath of warm water was tempting to tired and dirty men, and here we made our first and only stop for recreation. After lunch most of the party proceeded to the warm pool, and, stripping, we literally soaked for hours in its delightful waters, stopping occasionally to soap and scrub our linen. While here the party indulged in guessing the height of the inclosing cliffs. The air was so clear in this country that one always underestimated the magnitude of the relief. None of our estimates exceeded 500 feet. Seeing a good place for the first time in all our course to scale the canyon walls, I climbed them and measured the exact height, which was 1,650 feet. The view from the summit was superb, revealing the panoramas of the uplands, which is completely shut out while traversing the chasm below.

The Man and the Mule.

"Now," said the Man, "Corn is High, and I cannot afford to Feed it to a Mule. So the Proper Caper is to turn The Animal out to Browse and Let Him get any Old Diet he can Pick Up."

Then the Man took off His Coat and Hung it on the Fence while He went to get His Tools together to Sharpen them on The Grindstone.

"Haw, haw!" said the Mule. "Since I am to feed myself I will Eat Early and Often, and for Fear that I might suffer the Pangs of Hunger I will Begin on That Coat."

So the Mule ate up the Man's Coat and Then feeling the Need of A Little Exercise he kicked the Grindstone to Pieces, and when the Man saw the Result of his Economy He said that No Matter how High the price Was, for it would be Cheaper than Coats.

Moral.—It is a Wise Mule that knows its Own Fodder.—Chicago Times-Herald.

An Opportunity.

A number of years ago Adolf Wenzel, the great German artist, always a man of wonderful powers of observation, consented to act as mentor for a group of young artists, and, having posed their model one morning, as was his custom, he left them to their work. The model, it seems, was new to the profession and unequal to the strain of remaining immovable in one position, and so promptly fainted.

While the young men were making futile attempts at resuscitation, one of their number ran excitedly to the master's studio, informed him what had happened and asked what to do.

"Do!" exclaimed the herr professor. "The best thing you can do is to sketch it. You may never have another such opportunity."

Bill Nye and Wagner.

When Bill Nye was in Philadelphia in 1893, he visited the office of George W. Childs. At parting Mr. Childs asked the humorist to write a sentiment in his autograph album. Nye at once produced this: "Wagner's music is not as bad as it sounds."—Literary Era.

Satisfactorily Explained.

He was waiting on the street corner and as she got off the street car he lifted his hat and stiffly saluted.

"Deevenin, Miss Wharton?"

"Deevenin, Mistah Carr!" she replied, with her nose in the air.

"Miss Wharton," he continued as he swallowed at the lump in his throat, "when yo'r sister dun tole me yo' was at de candy pull wid dat low down puss named Jackson I couldn't skansey believe it."

"Mistah Carr," she replied as her nose went still higher, "when Linda Smith dun tole me dat yo' wanted her to help yo' git up a cake walk I tose my breff for five minits."

"Miss Wharton, I 'lows no woman to trifle wid my heart."

"And I 'lows no man to trifle wid mine, Mistah Carr."

"Under de circumstances, Miss Wharton, it will be better dat we meet as strangers."

"Dat's me, Mistah Carr."

"But, as life will have no charms for me, Miss Wharton, as each succeedin day would only add its burdens to my grievin heart, I will hang myself in de wood shed tonight."

"An I will take pizen, Mistah Carr. Sooner dan live on feelin dat no one lub me I will destroy myself."

"Who doan' lub yo'?"

"Yo' doan'."

"Who said so?"

"Yo' did."

"Miss Wharton—Maggie—I 'nebber axed dat Linda Smith to git up a cake walk wid me."

"Mistah Carr—Moses—I didn't go to de party wid dat puss named Jackson."

"Den I won't hang myself."

"Den I won't take pizen."

"Maggie!"

"Moses!"

And a cuckoo clock in the nearby house struck the hour of 7 in joyful exultation, and all was love and peace.

Grace Before Restaurant Meals.

"It's surprising how many of the people who eat here say grace at the table," said the cashier of a Market Street restaurant recently. "I notice it dozens of times a day. It's not at all a mere matter of habit with most of those who observe the custom either. We have lots of patrons coming here regularly through the week for lunch who wouldn't think of beginning a meal without the ceremony. There are others, of course, who are accustomed to saying grace at home and voluntarily go through the custom here, but I can pick them out from the conscientious class by the embarrassed way they peep around, as if they had made a 'break.' There's no occasion for them to worry, however, because our regular patrons are used to the ceremony now and take but little notice of those who preface their meals with it. When I first came here, it was quite a novelty to me, but I soon got accustomed to looking on it as part of the programme."—Philadelphia Record.

An Iceboat's Speed.

To those who have never seen an iceboat dart away and shrink to a mere speck on the horizon in a few minutes, the speed, were it not well vouched for, would be wholly incredible. A gentleman residing at Philadelphia who had just started by train for New York, He therefore sprang into his iceboat, soon passed the train, although it was an express, and was on the platform of the station at Newburg when the train drew up. At that point of his journey he had made two miles in one minute. Nevertheless, in spite of the various published records it may confidently be stated that the greatest speed is never recorded.—Cassell's Magazine.

Finis.

Teas—Mr. Sophie seems to be very attentive to you. I suppose congratulations will soon be in order.

Jess—They're in order now.

Teas—Really?

Jess—Yes, I rejected him last night.—Philadelphia Press.

Cough, Cough,

Night and day, until the strength is entirely exhausted, and that dreaded word "Consumption" begins to be whispered among friends. That's a common story, familiar to the people of every town and village.

There's another story which ought to be as widely known as the story of disease, and that is the story of the cures effected by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. Bronchitis, asthma, obstinate, deep-seated coughs, bleeding of the lungs, and other forms of disease which affect the respiratory organs, are permanently cured by the use of "Golden Medical Discovery."

"Only for Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery I think I would be in my grave to-day," writes Mr. Moses Miles, of Hilliard, Ohio, Co. Wyoming. "I had asthma so bad I could not sleep at night and was compelled to give up work. It affected my lungs so that I coughed all the time, both night and day. My wife thought I had consumption. My friends stated on my trying Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery—which I did, I have taken six bottles and am now a well man, weighing 150 pounds, thanks to Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery."

Dr. Pierce's Common Sense Medical Adviser is sent free on receipt of stamps to pay expense of mailing only. Send at once stamps for book in paper cover or 31 stamps for cloth-bound. Address Dr. E. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y.