Feese, Infant s of W. F. and Jennie, Hummel, Elias, d July 28, 1895, SOME NEW JERSEY WHALES.

nan's Not by One Making His Tollet.

"Down on the Jersey coast, where Sun, "I met a fisherman who told me a story about a whale-a hunchback whale. This fisherman had a pound net planted off the beach. The net was many hundred feet long and cost hundreds, I don't know but thousands, of dollars. One day after he had got the net set the fisherman saw a little farther off shore a humpback whale, sort of idling around in the water, but gradually working inshore. It was not unusual to see whales off the coast, and the fisherman wasn't very particularly struck by this whale, even when he saw that he was edging in toward the land and toward his pound net, because he expected really every minute to see him sheer off and go to sea again. "The idea of the whale's troubling his cound net never occurred to him, but the first thing he knew the whale was right alongside of it. The next minute the fisherman saw the whale rubbing, his back and sides against it, rubbing the barnacles off his back on his pound net!

"The hard, tarred rope, tied up in Flamond meshes, was just the thing for this, or would have been if the net and the stakes had been a little stronger; but apparently it pleased rubbed along it slowly, the barnacles not catching in the angles of the and being yanked off, or else a bunch or both together, tearing the net in some places, the whale crowding in harder all the time and being especially tickled when he rubbed against a stake, but making the stake bend and erack. And still a-crowding harder and harder, rubbing and scrubbing along, the wnale finally pushed the whole blessed pound net clean over and wrecked and half destroyed it. Then he up helm and put to sea. "Well, now, you know, I was inclined to doubt this story; just a little, anyhow; but another fisherman saw down there said, while this question that it was the simple truth. He said he'd seen whales rub and roll on a sandy beach to rub barnacles off, and he didn't see why a whale shouldfound one handy. He said whales often got great numbers of barnacles on them, not on the under part of Herrold, Geo. Irvin, s of Levi S. Moyer, Mariah, w of Daniel, b Apr the body, but on the sides or back. and that the barnacles grew and thrived there just as they would, for instance, on a turtle, or as they do in enormous numbers on ships. These barnacles may not actually irritate the whale, but they impede its progress just as they would a ship's, and

"The whale can't very well rub the barnacles off on the bottom, because it would be likely to find only soft coze and mud, and that's about what he'd find inshore, too, at the mouth of rivers and such places; but if he strikes a sandy beach, there he'll rub rick and Eliza, d Jan 27,1857 himself. And he might clean himself on a rocky coast; but if he did, it wouldn't be on the rocks, but on some loser, Johannis, b Nov 12, 1786; little beach where there was a place d May 15, 1855, aged 68 y 5 for it, made by the weathering of the rocks and grinding up of the fragments by the sea. The whale, this man said, certainly does come into such places to rub the barnacles off; and he thought the pound net story was no fish story, but just a plain statement of the facts. "I met down there another fisherman still who told me about a humpback whale he once met off Sandy Hook, when he was going into New York on a fishing smack. This whale was lying on top of the water, dead, to all appearances; and from what showed of it above the water it appeared to be about 45 feet long. They hold, headed the smack up for it, and had got within about 20 feet of it, when one of the crew dropped a sweep on the smack's deck. It struck the deck with a loud bang, and-"Swish-slap! went the whale's tail as he threw it up and then slammed it down on the water; and, zoo-op down and away he went in a grand crush and slather of foam and waves. of a mile off, and then they didn't see her lips in shape. "What is the fahim again at all. "The whale, you see, had just been they were glad the man dropped the side waiting for me, and I went to oar as he did and waked him, be- scare him away."—Tit-Bits. cause the smack was a small sloop, and the whale would have made it warm for them if they'd been over him, as they might have been, when he woke up."

The Largest Incubator. New South Wales has not only the largest duck farm in the commonwealth, but also probably the largest incubator in the world. The farm and incubator are situated at Botany, near Sydney, the latter, according to a Sydney paper, having a capacity of 11,440 necessary that it should be filled at any one time. The eggs can be put in at intervals, as they are available. With 50 eggs only it will work just as well as if it were filled. The incubator was designed and constructed by its proprietor, with the aid of an ingenious local mechanic.-N. Y. Herald.
