FARM POULTRY GROWING.

Suggestions Sent Out by A. G. Gilbert, Manager of the Canadian Experiment Farms.

The position of the farmer with regard to poultry is entirely different from that of the specialist with a large plant. To the former such information as the following from a late report of A. G. Gilbert, manager of the Canadian experimental farms, is especially directed:
Farmers have given increased attention during the past few years to artificial hatching and rearing of chickens, which have been pursued by two methods:
By filling the incubator and beginning operations in late February or early March.
By deferring hatching operations until the hens have had a run outside, and as a result their eggs will hatch better.

In connection with the second method unless the farmer has a brooding house, which permits of his being independent of outside temperature, he will have to content himself with incubator and outside brooder. His outside brooder is placed on the rapidly-growing grass, and with proper care and food the young chicks will be found to make famous progress.

At the experimental farms when the hens became broody they were set in wooden boxes placed in vacant pens in a house. The wooden nest boxes contained no bottoms and had a hinged door in front. The nests were made of dry lawn clippings, which were found to answer the purpose much better than cut straw. Grain, grit and drink water were constantly before the sitters. On being made, the nests were thoroughly dusted with a disinfecting powder, and so were the sitters before being put on the nests. It was found beneficial to place two or three china eggs in the nests as arranged and allow the broody hens to sit on them for a day or two. The sitters having proved reliable, the china eggs were removed and replaced by the valuable ones. In the morning the doors of the nest boxes, which had been closed from the previous day, were opened and the sitters allowed opportunity to get out for food, water and a short run. In early spring, when the weather is likely to be cold, the sitters should return to their nest inside of ten minutes. The foregoing details are all important in the successful hatching of chickens by hens.

Late April and May hen-hatched chickens did the better at the Canadian farms. In the case of hen-hatched chickens the latter were permitted to remain in their nest for 24 to 36 hours, when, with the mother hen, they were placed in a slatted coop on the grass outside. The coop was so arranged that it could be securely closed at night, while ventilation was secured. Through the slats the chicks could run on the grass outside, while the hen remained inside. On the floor of the coop was sand to the depth of two inches. On taking the mother hen from her nest she was given food and water. She would be more likely to brood the chicks contentedly after being fed than if hungry or thirsty. How important it is to have early chicks carefully brooded is well known to all experienced breeders. The ration adopted was stale bread crumbs, followed by stale bread soaked in milk and squeezed dry; this for a day or two. Crushed corn was not given until after eight days, and whole wheat was not fed until the twelfth or fourteenth day. As the chicks grew, a mash composed of shorts, corn meal, stale bread and a small quantity of prepared meal was mixed with boiling skim milk, allowed to cool, and was given three or four times per day. Milk and water were both furnished for drink.

Will it pay to keep a two-pound chick that will now bring 20 cents per pound until he weighs four pounds and sell him for 40 cents? There are poultry keepers who seem to think it will.—Farm Journal.
