At a large wedding reception in New York recently the attention of a couple of girls was attracted to a rather fastidious-looking man, whose prematurely gray hair and clear-cut features combined in giving him a distinguished appearance. "I see him at nearly every large wedding I go to," said one. "I wonder who he can be. I've asked a lot of people and nobody seems to know. 'Yet he seems to be invited everywhere.'" "Yes, I've noticed him, too," said the other girl. "While he apparently goes to all the big weddings, he doesn't seem to know anybody; or, at least, I've never seen him talking to anybody. He's such an interesting-looking man, too. I'd love to meet him. He looks like a man who has lived and—suffered." A young man standing near, who could not help overhearing this conversation, laughed. "Perhaps I can throw some light upon the identity of your mysterious hero," he said. "Do you know him?" "Well, I can't say that I exactly know him," replied the young man, "but I know who he is. He's a private detective. Perhaps you have noticed that he never strays far away from the tables on which the presents are displayed. That's what he's there for—to watch them. You know there are social highwaymen in—" "Let's go downstairs and get some claret cup," interrupted one of the girls.

The value of teaching of first-aid-to-the-injured is illustrated almost every day, but in no case more aptly than in that of a brakeman on the Erie railroad who fell from his train. A leg was cut off by the car wheels, but, with admirable presence of mind, the man constructed a tourniquet with his handkerchief and knife whereby he stopped the hemorrhage. Even in this condition he built a fire in order to warm himself, and waited the next train, which he signaled; he was taken aboard and to a hospital. We trust that the time will come, says the Philadelphia Medical Journal, when school children in the upper grades may be taught so much of "applied physiology" as will enable them to act sensibly in the case of the thousand emergencies sure to take place in after-life with themselves or their fellows. It is strange that almost all lay people "lose their heads" in accidents and injuries, and do precisely what should not be done. This is especially true when hemorrhage is present. Many people either faint or are seized with panic at the mere sight of blood—a possible echo of primitive barbaric blood rites and blood frenzies. To supplant this loss of control by calm and intelligent action according to the circumstances and condition is one of the duties we owe to the coming generations.

The wealthy soon become satiated and fall victims to ennui, which is worse than weariness, says John Gilmer Speed, in Woman's Home Companion. See these in their boxes at the opera. Below them and above them enthusiasm runs riot when De Reszke or Sembrich sings. They applaud languidly with dainty fan upon the gloved hand. They do it because they think it is expected of them; but their eyes do not light up, the color does not come into their cheeks, their bosoms do not swell with emotion. No; they are tired, they are worn out, they have gone through too much, and even music cannot move them. They really are to be pitied. In the highest gallery sit men and women who get much more out of the music than these people. They get delight; and of delight those who have too much are soon incapable.

A young man from Bowling Green, Mo., applied for work in a store located some distance from his home. He presented the following letter of recommendation and was engaged on the spot: "I have found him industrious, truthful, intelligent and sober. I have observed also that his services about the house were satisfactory to my wife, and anyone who can get along with her is a peach."

A Spanish immigrant from Gibraltar who arrived at New York last week bore such a strong physical resemblance to Abraham Lincoln that the inspector, an old soldier who had seen the war president, obtained a photograph of the tall Spaniard.

Extreme frankness characterizes one business man of Ottaville, Mo. He closed his store and left this notice stuck on the door: "Gone to the street fair at Sedalia. Will be back when I get sober."

The Philadelphia directory shows nine men who bear the name of Thomas Thomas and 11 known as Robert Roberts. But William Williams outnumbers them both, as there are 86 citizens thus named.

Of 600 men who presented themselves in Chicago to pass the physical examination for firemen 100 were rejected because of heart trouble. Chicago has long been famous for its divorce courts.

A Baltimore court has confiscated to the state the skins of 2,800 seagulls killed in violation of law. The skins were intended to adorn women's hats.
