Gea. Lloyd Wheaton Is Simply Idolized by His Men.

All Sorts of Pleasant Little Stories Are Told About His Courage and Consideration of Privates' Comfort,

Gen. Lloyd Wheaton, whose frankness in expressing his opinions has stirred up a number of senatorial critics, will not ask for defenders. Practically without exception the men who have served under him, whom they fondly call "Dad" Wheaton, would fight for him to the last ditch against any odds. Even among the general officers of the United States army, including so many men of dauntless courage and splendid character, there are few who rank with Wheaton in personal popularity among the enlisted men. In appearance be is the ideal soldier, tall and straight as a pine tree. His thick hair is jet black and the lower part of his face is covered with a black beard, set off by a pair of long and fiercely-pointed black mustaches. On horseback especially he looks the part of a pirate king, and his voice is a deep bass of tremendous power that can be heard at great distances.

It is a favorite joke with the soldiers in the islands that "Old Dad" needs no staff, because he can make himself heard half a mile without straining himself. Most endearing of all, from the standpoint of the common soldier. Gen. Wheaton never spares himself. and many a little outpost, hard pressed by an overpowering force of the "niggers," has been inspired by the roaring command of "Old Dad"-"Go in. boys! Go in!"-while he himself, riding like a centaur, led the charge far in advance of the advancing column. has proved himself a magician. Al-Even his presence is inspiring. 'Old Dad,' " and then rushes into the fight the big bay horse, topped by the big, fierce man, with his black beard, and all is over but the shouting.

Enlisted men returned from service in the islands tell all sorts of little stories of Gen. Wheaton. For instance, there was the night after the landing at San Fabian. Six gunboats, says the Chicago Tribune, had gone down the coast to cover the landing of a lot of men under Gen. Wheaton, who were loaded on a couple of army transports. While the gunboats shelled the town Wheaton got his men into launches and other small boats and waited for the first chance to get ashore. Once or twice his eagerness led him to push ahead within range of the gunboats' fire, and each time he had to face about and retire, much to the amusement of the men, bobbing about on the swell in their little boats. Finally the party landed, under a hot fire from the insurgents, and rushed the town. After pickets had been thrown out and all arrangements made for guarding against a night attack, Gen. Wheaton started to turn in, with the idea of catching a few hours' sleep. He and his orderly went into a native house on the square and opened the door leading into the corner room. As they did so a couple of privates, who had already lain down to sleep on the floor, rose speedily, came to attention, saluted and started to leave the room.

"Here you!" roared "Old Dad," in his terrifying voice, "you boys need sleep just as much as I do. Lie down again and go to sleep." So the commanding general and a couple of privates went to sleep side by side on the floor. But early in the morning, before any one else was awake, Gen. Wheaton got up and went out all alone on a reconnoitering tour. He closed the door, and it locked behind him with a spring lock. Several times during the night stragglers had come pounding on the door, and had been ordered away by the somewhat sulphuric orderly. It happened that the orderly had just got into a sound sleep when the general returned and knocked for admission. The orderly, who had no idea that Gen. Wheaton had gone out, woke up hot and angry. With all the resources of his picturesque vocabulary he cursed the man who had disturbed him and ordered him to go away under awful penalties. "Now, you clear out of here and let us sleep, or I'll come out and kick your head off!" he roared.

"All right, sergeant," sounded the deep voice of "Old Dad," "all right, I'll clear out. But won't you please let me have my field glasses first?"

	Dry-Picking for Market.

When dry-picking turkeys or other poultry for market be careful to remove the pin-feathers. The carcasses are "plumped" by throwing them into ice-cold water, allowing them to remain in the water four or five hours or longer, then hanging them up, heads down, to drip and dry, keeping them in a cool place. Do not scald dry-picked birds. While the dry-picking method gives the birds the best appearance for market, for home use the best and ensiest mode is to quickly scald them, then remove the feathers, and also the entrails. If "plumped" it should be done before drawing the entrails. The scalding process cleans the skin and
