> body of the drunken man. One readsion. The question is, how we can best check the evils of intemperance. The principle must be to overcome avil with good, and one of the practical methods is hinted at in this utterance of Henry van Dyke in the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class at Princeton last June: "Intemperance," he said, "is the type of all avils, because so many others grow out of it. The way to attack it is to make sober life beautiful and full of interest. Teach your boys how to work, how to read and saudy, you, fathers, before you send them to college, if you want to guard them against the temptations of strong drink and the many shames and sorrows that go with it. You reformers, provide men with recreations that will not barm them, if you want to take away the ower of the gilded saloons."
