RAYMOND McINTOSH was a man of high ideals and when he went into politics he was moved not only by a personal ambition, but also by the keenest desire to serve the people faithfully and to do his full share toward raising the standard of political ethics. He fought the "bosses" tooth and nail and his voice and pen were ever ready to attack jobbery and corruption.

Before he took any part in the great political game he had talked it all over with Mary. She approved entirely of his ideas and aims, but was doubtful of the advisability of a man attempting to stem the flood of corruption which dominated
