VITUPERATION.

An editor reached the arena of life, Where full were the prospects and fair was the start, And future was golden as man could behold; The levels of knowledge were his to attain. The portal was open to honor and fame, But lo he was mortal and human and weak And yielded to cavil in passionate zeal. He sacrificed much to the devils of greed. The great moral issues he laid all aside And railed at the leaders who strove for the right But catered to that which would yield him some gain, And, blinded by passion, by rancor and spite, He hurled forth his venom, malignant with hate, And ruthlessly murdered the one he disliked. His morbid invectives he flaunted in print. And yielded his dignity, self and respect To gratify lust with infamous shame. The cost of his blindness was patrons and friends, Who scorned such injustice and spurned his sway, To live with his devils, the certain reward. That Justice bestows in the vengeance of God.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

Special to The Commercial.
PRACTICAL IRRIGATION.
Government scientists who have been devoting their skill and energies to the reclamation of the waste places in this country by means of the storage of flood waters and the irrigation of lands which receive too little rain for the successful growth of crops, are delighted to know that at the San Diego Exposition in 1915 there will be a complete demonstration of the science of irrigation, in which the government will take a very prominent part. Even now those who usually visit the exposition grounds will have their interest aroused by two very different systems of irrigation. It should be said that the Exposition is to have a magnificent, lavish floral setting, and that millions of palms, ferns, decorative trees and flowering plants are now being cultivated in a great nursery on the Exposition grounds so that there shall be an abundance of material with which to make this the greatest floral exposition that has ever been held. In growing all of these plants in a climate like that of San Diego, where the rainfall is light, it is necessary to give them much water, so the management has drawn on the magnificent and inexhaustible artificial supply belonging to the City, and has installed a great system of pipes for sub-irrigation, and another system of overhead pipes for the making of artificial rain from above. Whenever it is desired to drench the foliage and cleanse it of dust, or refresh the thirsty leaves, the gardener can turn a spigot and have a gentle rain descend at any point, or over the entire horticultural and floral plantation, including the orange and lemon groves which the southern counties are making a part of their exhibit.

Probably this will be the first time in history that visitors to an exposition can walk into a bearing orange grove, laden with the peerless fruits so full of juice that nature has had to leave the seeds out entirely, and pluck from the trees such fruit as never before was known, even by the first parents in the Garden. That is what will be possible at San Diego in 1915, and all that will be necessary will be to see President D. C. Collier and secure a permit to roam in the garden and pluck the fruit with no fear of being banished by a guardian with a big stick or a flaming (or other) sword.

TEMPERANCE ADMINISTRATION.

Not a little interest was manifested throughout the country in the report that this would be a dry season at the White House. The President, the Vice-President, and most of the Cabinet, it was announced, would taboo the cup that cheers. But now comes the report that this was premature and too sweeping; that there would be an opportunity for thirsty diplomats and others who enjoy a glass of wine, to indulge that taste at formal dinners. The President is in favor of temperance, but he is not going to try to make the representatives of foreign governments conform to his ideas in this respect, and even his fellow countrymen—not excepting his private secretary, the faithful Tumulty—will be permitted a great deal of leeway in the choice of food and drink. Even in California where the wine grape flourishes to perfection there are many prohibition communities, but this will not prevent the great Exposition of 1915 at San Diego from having exhibits showing how wine is produced, from the propagation of cuttings and the growth of the grapes, to the placing of labels on the bottles.
