SOME MARKS OF THE GOOD TEACHER.

This is the time of the year when school boards are considering the selection of teachers for next year's work. Parents are wondering who will be elected to care for the training of their children and the children themselves are already discussing the question among themselves. In as much as the subject seems to be of general interest, it might be well to consider some qualifications of the successful teacher.

Teaching is a profession. It requires knowledge of material and method. Those who are best prepared are most likely to succeed. Knowledge, then, seems to be the first requisite. Knowledge of what? The true teacher must have a solid foundation in the subject matter itself. No teacher can do good work who has to struggle along to keep pace with his pupils. A stream will not rise above its source, neither will a school rise above the teacher. It is necessary that the teacher be prepared beyond the books of the school room, that he had some information and help beyond that of his pupils. The broader and firmer the foundation of the teacher, the higher and sturdier the structure built upon it. Scholarship on the part of the teacher creates interest on the part of pupils, commands their respect and confidence, inspires them to work, and creates ideas for them to attain. The teacher will be successful in proportion to his own ability and faithfulness as a student.

Knowledge of subject matter is not sufficient. The teacher must have a love for children and a knowledge of child nature. He must be able to see how the world looks from the viewpoint of the child. Insight into child nature, sympathy with child life, and knowledge of the child's mental processes are absolutely essential to successful teaching.

The teacher takes the small child when he enters school and throughout the year, fashions and shapes his mind. What the teacher does with that mind, determines, largely, what its future will be. Of what importance it is, then, that no bungler should practice on such material as this. "No unskilled hand should ever play upon a harp whose strings remain forever in the strings." One may know what to teach and yet fail to know how. One is not a teacher until he knows how.

We occasionally make the mistake of employing those as teachers who have had no professional training. The physician deals only with the body yet now many would be willing to entrust their health to one who had only graduated in the grades or from the Public High Schools. We want our physician now-a-days, to be not only a college trained man, but one who has had four years of professional training on top of that. The child's mind is more plastic than the body. Why then should its care be placed in unskilled hands? A doctor might gain some skill and experience by a two-year study and practice in a rural community, under his own tutelage. Could he then go town and practice? I fear few would have much confidence in his work. When the body needs care, we want the best trained doctor we can get, and we are willing to pay the price to get him. Why do we not take the same stand when it comes to the care and treatment of our children's minds?

If the teacher has such knowledge of his subject matter that he inspires confidence, and has some professional training, the question of discipline is a small matter. Children love to obey the cool, clear-headed person who knows what he wants and why he wants it, and insists on having it. Knowledge of child nature and a little common sense are the elements of discipline.

The disposition of the teacher has a great influence in the school room and needs to be considered. A cheerful disposition brings sunshine into the lives of the children. On the other hand, the grim, unbending creature, who never smiles, cast a shadow over the school and never really succeeds in their work. One need not be a clown however, in order to spread cheerfulness.

Self-control is another element that is valuable to the teacher. No pupil really respects a teacher who lacks this quality.

The successful teacher must be broad-minded, well-informed, courteous, confident, and persevering. In addition to these qualities, he must have the possibility of growth and development. He must take a real interest in educational matters. Must read educational literature and must read pedagogical books. The teacher who has ceased to grow, is educationally dead and might just as well be buried educationally. There is no use in postponing the ceremony, even though his body does continue to move about on earth. When such applicant present themselves, the school board should all join hands and whistle a slow, sad requiem for the educational spirit that has been long since gathered to its fathers, and then proceed to take up the next live one.

DON'T SAY UNDERWEAR, SAY MUNSINGWEAR

BEYOND COMPARE MUNSING WEAR. ALWAYS PERFECT FITTING.

MUNSING AN UNDERWEAR WITH A NAME.

In buying underwear did you ever stop to consider the difference between a garment which the manufacturer is proud to put his name on, and the ordinary kind that is sent out into the world absolutely nameless. In one case the manufacturer knows that his reputation is at stake. Every garment must be made right and finished right, or the reputation of his underwear suffers. In the other cases no one wants to assume the responsibility. Munsing Underwear is different from most other kinds. Every garment comes directly to us from the factory with the name on each piece. It's made right and fits right. We don't know how it would be possible to make it better, and it costs no more than the nameless, go as you please kind that you find in most stores.
