SALISBURY.

Reports from Coal Run indicate that an airship passed over that village one cold night a short time ago. The noise of the engine at work was distinctly heard and sounded like the working of the cylinder of an automobile. Some of the most optimistic citizens are of the opinion that "Timmie" Ohler finally got his air-ship invention to working and was making a secret trial flight. Should this be the case and his airship continue to fly, we will likely hear from him later.

Many people wonder why that indispensable tool, the monkey-wrench, came to be called by that rather odd name. An answer was given in the "Quiz" column of one of our leading weeklies last week in which it was stated that it was named after the inventor who was John Monckey. This also reminds us of a story about an automobilist who stalled with his machine while driving in North Dakota and being in need of a wrench went to a Swede farmer and asked for the loan of a monkey-wrench. The farmer promptly replied that his brother farther north had a sheep ranch, he conducted a horse ranch, his neighbor conducted a cattle ranch but he didn't know of any person in that whole country that had a monkey ranch.
