ILLEGAL SIGNS IN PENNSYLVANIA.

It is not generally known that vast numbers of advertising signs exist in the State of Pennsylvania in defiance of the law. These signs are erected mostly by concerns doing a national business, who are aware of the law, but who count on ability to violate it with impunity because the law officers of many communities do not act. Local business men are less frequent offenders, not knowing the law. Candidates for office also break the law, usually in ignorance of it.

The tens of thousands of tin tobacco signs, soap signs, bread signs, and the like, tacked on trees, telegraph poles, etc., within the limits of highways in the State of Pennsylvania, are all illegal and are by an act of March 10, 1903, declared to be public nuisances, which anyone may remove and abate without notice to the offender, who is subject to a penalty of not less than five dollars nor more than twenty dollars for each offender upon conviction.

All signs and banners swung across the streets are clearly illegal, and no mayor, burgess, council of commissioners have any right to grant permission to erect such intrusions.

All sign bills on the fences erected on the sidewalk or street to protect the work of tearing down or erecting buildings and all signs on contractors' sheds, etc., placed on the street or highway are illegal and a "public nuisance."

ACETYLENE BI-PRODUCT VALUABLE FERTILIZER

A Johnstown florist has discovered a new fertilizer which is of great interest to users of calcium carbide. He discovered that the bi-product of a carbide lamp, which is generally considered worthless, is one of the finest fertilizers he ever tried. He now has miners saving the slacked carbide from their lamps for him thus giving miners an opportunity to cut down their illuminating expenses in the sale of this bi-product.

He discovered this by accident. A miner came along and carelessly emptied his slacked carbide from his lamp on one of his flower plants, but fortunately it was a stunted one which seemed to be doomed to die. Therefore the florist did not take the trouble to clean it off.

To his surprise the flower began to revive and in a short time became a fine specimen. He then tried it on others with equally good results.

Johnstown's police force does not believe that the practice in vogue in some cities of photographing habitual drunkards and establishing a "jag" list would prove successful there. Repeatedly offenders have been posted in saloons without any effect.

DRAINED SWAMPS MAKE FINE FARM LAND

"In Pennsylvania there are many swamps that could be very easily be drained and turned into the richest farm lands," says Charles G. McLain, drainage and water supply engineer of the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture.

"These swamps are usually very rich and produce good crops of anything planted there" says Mr. McLain, "and as a rule all of them have an outlet of sufficient depth to allow good drainage. The best way to go about the draining is, to put through a good-sized open ditch with a few branches to get the surplus water away and allow for the natural setting of the ground to a compactness that will then take place.

When this settlement has taken a good system of underdrainage can be arranged. In doing this the large open ditches can be filled as they interfere with economical operations on account of the time taken up in turning the teams on the small lands. By working the entire surface longer rows can be used and much time saved in cultivation, planting and harvesting.

"It has been my pleasure to have laid out drainage systems in a number of these swamps and all are giving good results. If you have one of the swampy or wet places on your farm you are losing the use of possibly the most productive land you may own. Why continue to cultivate steep side hill sides where the work is both hard and expensive when you can improve this low level land and use the hill sides for a permanent pasture land?"

"The reports from parties who have developed their low lands are very encouraging as all indicate a much greater return with less expense and labor. The cost of this drainage is not prohibitive for the greater returns soon pay it back. Even on land that is constantly cultivated the return is sufficient to pay all expenses in a very few years.
