and that they were just the most things imaginable.
"I never could endure seeing a fat woman cry, and when she said she didn't know what in the world she was going to do I had to offer to hang those pictures for her."
"And now I want to tell you one thing, Henry, if you think I was going to risk my precious neck on that old patched up ladder you're mistaken, that's all! I slipped home and got our good ladder and to save my face I had to tell her I borrowed it from the Hensleys. She thanked me profusely and said in that case not to bother about it any more, as she would return it to them direct when she got thru with it."
"Great guns!" exploded Justly. "Don't you know George Hensley swore that ladder was the one he lost and claimed it not more than a week after I bought and paid good money for it?"
"Is that so?" retorted Mrs. Justly, flatly. "Well, I don't care, anyway. It serves you right. And really, I'm glad you told me; it relieves my mind. When she takes it back and tells that I said I borrowed it from them, they'll just take it and not give me away."
