UNITED STATES AND AVIATION PROGRESS

Country is making faster progress in aviation than the United States. There has been a great impetus given to this science during the few years owing to the exploits of Lindbergh and other American aviators. Great progress has been made the days of Orville and Wilbur, but aviation is still in its infancy according to William M. McLean, Jr., Assistant Secretary of the National Aeronautics. In an interesting article in the current number of the National Republic on aviation progress in America Mr. McLean says of the future of aviation in the United States:

It does the immediate future that it would be rash, I think, to make a prediction. Great projects are in the air—for the air. An almost feverish activity is there in evidence.

One may see, in the near future, larger planes controlled by auto-pilots. Dessel-type engines are here—gas-burning plants are of adjustable propellers to provide the airplane with the equivalent of the speed-changing mechanism of the automobile. The airport is under construction, and can anticipate launching demand arresting gear to commercial use.

We are witnessing the entrance of the private pilot who is the fun of the thing and in the course of his daily routine, he is beginning to make his appearance here and everywhere. The air is rapidly coming within the range of the average wage-earner.

Improvements of the plane process. To name only one: recently completed at, by clever sound-proofing, within the cabin of a passenger plane, which in the past has been as noisy as a well-nigh deafening volume.

part, you may ask, does the present of Commerce play in this? The Air Commerce Act of 1926, designed to our department of the regulation of civil aviation. So the Aeronautics Act, which I am privileged to read, inspects all planes to see if they are 'airworthy.' It examines and licenses the pilots and establishes the rules of air-traffic.
