NOVELTY IN ENGINES.

The Diesel Requires No Stoker and Emits No Smell or Smoke. The Diesel engine is a new thing, rich with promise. It has no boiler and no furnace; it requires no stoker; it emits no smell or smoke. I have seen a 22 horsepower specimen at work near Manchester, writes a correspondent of the London News, and the principle is equally applicable to an engine of 2,200 horsepower. Its fuel is various. The Manchester specimen feeds on air and oil-ordinary air and oil of the coarsest and cheapest. Gases-including, it is believed, one that is at present a waste product-and coal dust. also in conjunction with air, are alter-as other engines. And now to give some clew to the why and wherefore. The returning piston in the latter stage of the stroke compresses air until it is sufficiently hot to ignite oil that is gradually inlected, and the resulting expansion propels the piston again. The inodorous and invisible product of combustion is expelled from the cylinder by a current of air having play during the earlier stage of the piston's return. An initial thrust of the piston is secured by the introduction of compressed air from a special reservoir.

It only remains to explain how it is that the new engine gives forth neither smoke nor smell. Complete combustion of fuel is the ideal that Mr. Diesel has aimed at and apparently achieved. The smell that comes from first place, country houses-not the to me) both represent fuel which, owmillionaires' palaces, but just the ing to a deficiency of available oxygen, chintz or cretonne.
