thrift and gain of my steers that the cottonseed meal was very profitable. This conclusion has always been justified also when my steers were sold." Best Feed For Steers.

A mixture of three parts corn and cob meal and one part each of ground oats, bran and oilmeal makes a good grain ration for steers, says C. S. Plumb in Rural New Yorker. If any change were to be recommended in this, it would be to increase the proportion of cornmeal in the later stage of fattening. One can leave out some of the above grains, but good feeders will probably give good enough returns to justify the expenditure, and cattle usually grow faster and do bet ter on a variety of grains than on only one sort. The bran is desirable on account of its laxative and cooling effect, while the oilmeal helps produce a silky coat of hair and a mellow skin. If I were to leave out any of the above, it would perhaps be the oats. If you have plenty of clover hay, feed it entirely instead of timothy. Timothy is not the best sort of hay for cattle unless very fine and leafy and well Silage For "Baby Beet." The silo should prove a real help to those producing "baby" beef. Silage will help make up any possible shortage in summer pastures resulting from drought, says Professor W. A. Henry in Breeder's Gazette. It will take the place of roots at far less cost. The allowance of silage used in such cases should always be materially diminished, however, as the animals approach the finishing period. Too heavy an allowance of silage will leave the bodies unsatisfactory from the butcher's standpoint.

Refuge Huts. In the higher region of the Cordil-leras are refuge huts for the postmen who have to make their rounds until late in the winter. Even thus some of these men perish every winter if overtaken by a storm lasting several days.

the one that is narrow. Bear in mind that in this addition very little is added to the bony frame.

How can we widen the carcass by adding the inch referred to? Not by changing your male upon every discovery of a want in your herd, but by selecting the female of greatest breadth of carcass, sending her to your neighbor, whether he be near or somewhat remote, who possesses a sire of note in the point referred to. One of the six imported bulls belonging to the Alexander herd possessed the feature mentioned. We remember to have measured his breadth at the hips, finding an added width of inches beyond the average. But that bull had a fraction of blood outside of that rated as fashionable, and his services were not sought.

Cottonseed Meal as a Feed.

W. F. McSparran of Pennsylvania, writing in Breeder's Gazette on the value of cottonseed meal as a food for fattening steers, says: "In steer feeding where the ration has been well eared corn silage, mixed timothy and clover hay, corn and cob meal and cottonseed meal it has been always a most satisfactory addition to the ration, and without making any specific experiments I have concluded from the thrift and gain of my steers that the cottonseed meal was very profitable.
