Kelvin wheeled around in his chair and beamed upon Donald, rubbing his knees meanwhile with great enthusiasm. It is lucky that the man can afford as many pairs of trousers as he may require, for he must wear them out fast.

"You will not feel like giving a fete on that day," said Donald hurriedly. "Something is going to happen. What he said must have reassured her, for she smiled and kissed him tenderly upon miles of Tunbridge. Next morning on my way to the office I called at The Elms and repeated Donald's proposal to Kelvin, who ac cepted it readily. Afterward I laid the case before Bunn and mentioned Donald's sketch of the person whom he seemed to see delivering the deed. "The devil?" cried Bunn, whose nerves were in an even worse condition than usual. "That's old Walmsley himself!" The description certainly fitted him, and yet I was not prepared to believe that he would rise from the grave in which he had lain for more than a score of years and atone for the fraud attempted in his life by restoring the document upon which it had depended.

CHAPTER XII.

MYSTERY OF THE DEAD MISER'S HAND CONTINUED). ELVIN had named half past 9 o'clock as the time when he would receive his erring servant. It may have been an hour earlier that Donald, Jim Bunn and I went to The Elms. We were treated somewhat as if we had been a band of conspirators and were ushered with appropriate secrecy nto a small room opening off the libra ry. It was dimly lighted, and the cur ains were closely drawn, making the place very uncomfortable on a warm summer night.

Graves Reedy was there, much to my surprise, for I supposed that he would be shadowing Cobb. The detective's manner revealed to me that strictly professional cheerfulness with which he bears adversity.

"Cobb has disappeared," said Kelvin. "Mr. Reedy has lost track of him." "Temporarily, temporarily," respond ed Reedy. "We shall pick him up

He then went on to explain how this accident had happened. Cobb had taken up his abode in a little hotel which most of us in Tunbridge would have been glad to see the last of, and from this place in the course of the previous evening Cobb had withdrawn himself remarkably keen eyes of Mr. Graves with excitement.

The detective had promptly discovered the fact of the fellow's absence, and, being firmly convinced that the affair of the deed and the bogus heir was a plot in which Joe Harvey, the lawyer, was intimately concerned, he had gone to Harvey's house, but Cobb had not appeared there, nor had he revealed himself during the remainder of the night and the following day.

"He's gone to get the document, said Kelvin, with decision. "I think that his disappearance is a good sign.

I turned to Reedy for his opinion. "There's another way of looking at it," said he. "You must remember that this job may not be on you, Mr. Kelvin. I've explained that already," he added, turning to me. "Cobb was in jail, and he wanted to get out. So he gets into communication with this shystering lawyer, convinces him that the deed which Mr. Kelvin wants is in existence, puts up the job of the pretended Walmsley heir and induces Harvey to furnish $500 cash bail in order that Cobb may get out of jail and find the deed. You see, Harvey could get his money back any time by surrendering Cobb, so he doesn't think that he risks much. But Cobb really hasn't any document to produce. All he wanted was to get out of limbo, and, being out, he up with another. The place for such a man is the penitentiary.

This looks "In a business matter," said Kelvin, "I wouldn't do it, little mother," said quite reasonable to me, and when I said that we'd pick up Cobb I didn't mean that we'd necessarily pick him > up in this town." There was a silence following this presentation of the case, and during the interval'I happened to notice Jim Bunn eying Donald in a questioning way. In regard to Donald's powers Bunn had the most marked alternations of skepticism and belief. He was evidently more deeply interested than he cared to own. He was by nature greedy for the marvelous and capable of great excitement over mysteries. There had been periods when he had frequented such "mediums" as advertise in the newspapers and had sought advice upon business matters from the most absurd sources. It was ever his way to be convinced in a moment and then to change his attitude to one of general and feverish incredulity quite as unreasoning as his belief had been In regard to Donald, I think he was much influenced by Carl Archer, who took a frivolous view of the subject;

yet Bunn would have been glad to be-lieve the contrary. He was looking for some great revelation that would have but one interpretation, and he had welcomed this chance to go with us to Kelvin's in the hope of seeing that which would set all his doubts at rest-per haps in the fear of seeing it, for he had a deep seated terror of the supernatural. He felt, as I did, that Donald would not have gone to that house unless he had known that he had work to do there. Always in such cases there seemed to be a great impelling force urging Donald onward despite the reluctance of his will.

"Well," said Bunn at last, unable to people." restrain his impatience any longer, 'what do you think of it, Don?" "Don't ask me," responded the boy "I don't know anything proceed, though we all urged him. Finally he said: "If I could think of any way that this document could be returned without Cobb's having anything to do with .t—Cobb, Harvey or any of that crew why, then I'd know what I was talk-ng about." "You are thinking of the man whom you described to me," said I.

He shook his head. "I've decided I was mistaken," he replied. "That man can't bring back the deed."

"Why?" asked Bunn in a sort of It evidently required a great effort

"Because," he said, as if the words were forced out of him, "the man's dead." Bunn looked at me and nodded.

"What did I tell you?" he whispered "Walmsley!" "I am inclined to think," said Donald "that I was mixing the past with the future. That's the great trouble with this foolish business. I don't doubt that you've all had similar experiences Everybody must have them once in awhile. Something comes into your mind; you see it; you know it for an actual occurrence. But it has no time There's nothing to tell you whether the thing is going to happen a hundred years from now or whether it happen

"You don't always see clothes, of course," said Donald as if he couldn't bring himself to believe that Reedy had been serious. "You see the thing that has no need of clothes or of flesh and bones-the essence of an action. If you should strike me with a knife, Mr. Reedy, do you suppose that there'd be nothing in the act except your arm and the weapon? You might as well say that there'd be nothing but your coat sleeve or your skin. Within the sleeve, within the skin, within the mus-

"I am surprised," replied Donald. "But the point is," said Kelvin, bringing his practical mind to bear upon the question, "shall we get hold of that paper? Now, let's bring it right down t business. I expected to see Donald get up and walk out of the house, but he seemed to be too deeply absorbed in his own thoughts or visions, or whatever they can be called, to take note of what Kelvin had said.

"We shall know all about this matter in a few minutes," said Reedy, looking at his watch. "If Cobb doesn't come, it's all off. And he'll be here on time if he's coming." We waited, therefore, with such patience as we could command. At twenty minutes past 9 Kelvin went into the library, which was dark. Thereafter

we looked at our watches at least once a minute until a quarter before 10, when Kelvin came to the door and said in a tone of disappointment: "The fellow hasn't shown up." "There's no use in waiting any longer," said Reedy. "No Cobb; no deed. Your title is safe, Mr. Kelvin. The whole thing was a fake." "There is a deed, though," said Donald so softly that no one but Bunn and I heard him. "And somebody, somebody, will deliver it here—the same man whom I have seen. By heavens, dead or alive, he will produce that document this night!" Bunn took me suddenly by the arm. in a manner so secret as to elude the and I could feel that he was trembling "There are queer things in this world.

Mr. Harrington," he whispered, "1 don't know just what to expect, do you?" "I expect Walmsley's ghost, if you ask me," said I, with a laugh, and the remark lacked very little of being perfectly sincere. At 10 o'clock Kelvin gave up the vigil and summoned us all into the library. He had turned up the lights, and the room was bright.

"I am sorry to have given you all this trouble, Mr. Harrington," said he, "but I had reason to expect a different ending of this affair."

"I don't think that it's ended vet." I responded. "Donaid says that the deed will be restored." "Well," said Kelvin, "I hope he's right. I'd like to get the thing off my mind. It would be worth money to me, as I've told you. I've got other things to think about." I was well aware that one of the things to which he referred was my own destruction, but this was a time of truce in our warfare, and I felt under obligations to let the subject rest. Indeed, my attention was almost immediately attracted to Donald, who had advanced to the end of a long and heavy table of black oak, the top of which was bare. He was staring down at this table, and his attitude was rigid. Bunn spoke to him twice and even laid a hand upon his arm, but the boy did not stir.

Presently, however, he shook himself and stood erect. "I have a curious fancy," he said. "Mr. Kelvin, may I ask you where you got this table? It's a queer question"-"That was in the house," said Kelvin.

"It's very old." Donald tapped upon it with his fin-

"What made that mark?" he asked. The mark extended across a corner of the table and may have been ten inches long. It was quite deep at one end and a mere scratch at the other. "I don't know," said Kelvin, examining it. "From the looks of the thing I should say that it was made a long time ago." "Before you were born, my son," said Reedy to Donald. "Looks as if some body had hit it with a cleaver." Donald drew in his breath through his closed teeth, and it made a peculfarly eerie sound. I glanced hastily at his face, and it wore a very strange and almost terrifying expression. It was as if he were dead; as if the spirit had departed out of him. He stood by the end of the table, and we fell into a sort of group around it. The light was above, and it showed our inverted images in the black and polished surface. "It was all in the past," said Donald. "I feared that it might be so. I cannot help you, Mr. Kelvin, further than to assure you that the deed of transfer once existed and that it came into the possession of the rightful owner of this property after having been in the hands of a rascal. This I judge by the in the central part of the state, Coles scene itself. I know nothing of the

"Come!" said Reedy. "That's worth knowing. Let's hear your story." Bunn, who was standing beside me suddenly leaned upon my shoulder. "I feel a bit faint," he said and pointed down to the reflections in the table, where for a certainty we all looked like dead men. "I'll have to do the best I can," said Donald, with something like a groan "This takes the life out of me, but I'll have to go through with it somehow. It's as if I saw this room, but a good deal different, of course. This table is here, and there is a single candle burning upon it. Beside the table is a man sitting in a chair. He seems to have a sort of light sack coat on over a part of a military uniform. He is very broad in the shoulders. He's one the strongest looking men that ever I saw, though not very tall, I shoul judge. He has a little black mustach that is too small for his face. It looks
