She was also searching for a lost child. who, it is needless to explain, was at that moment sleeping soundly at the hospitable home of J. B. McCov, West Market street.

One seldom hears of an odder caper on the part of such small children. About 9 o'clock, Mrs. Forred explained, her little daughter Hannah had begged permission to run down to Mrs. Bannigan's and play with Marion, the little daughter of the household. She gave her consent and thought no more about it until nearly noon when Mrs. Bannigan appeared at her house making inquiries about her little girl. Mutual explanations revealed that little Hannah Forred had appeared at the Bannigan home and that after some time both children disappeared. Mrs. Bannigan thought they had run up to Forred's and gave herself no concern. An odd circumstance connected with the affair was that the two little girls during their trip down town exchanged their coats, one of which was red and the other grey. This led to much confusion during the search, as the little girl who left home with red head gear and a red coat was quite a different girl with red head gear and a grey coat. The change worked the same effect in the case of the other girl.

No one had seen such a child as either of the ladies described her daughter and because of this the auxiety of the parents was greatly prolonged.
