GERMAN UPRISING.

SCORES SERIOUSLY INJURED.

In the Efforts of the Police to Quell the

A popular uprising such as has not been seen since the memorable year of revolution and blood-1848—took place in the streets of Berlin, Germany, on Friday. Thousands of idle, hungry men raised the cry for bread in front of the Royal Palace. Only after much bloodshed was a semblance of order retread. Numbers are in the horsitate order restored. Numbers are in the hospitals probably fatally wounded. An exact record of their condition cannot be obtained. The rioters had the sympathy of thousands of spectators. The Kaiser himself watched the battle between the police and mob from a window in the Palace.

In defiance of recent orders of the authorities, about 5,000 idle workingmen met in a public square and adopted reduction of the control of the control rictious march to the palace began. The crowd refused to listen to a few cool headed leaders. The cry was, "We will see the Emperor himself."

The mention of the Emperors's name was received with derisive howls by the mob and a hurricane of insulting remarks, accompanied with terrible curses. The real sentiments of the German masses seemed to come to the surface for the first time. Apparently, feelings of wrath and indignation, long pent up, were breaking forth.

By this time the mob was some 6,000 strong. The rioters determinedly proceeded to the castle gates and there a desperate conflict occurred between the police and populace, the latter finally being overcome. While the battle was being fought, Emperor william of Germany, paleaud looking like a man just recovering from a severe attack of sickness, watched his subjects struggling with the men he had termed his "butchers," their only crime being that they desired to appeal to treir monarch for the justice which they claim they are unable to obtain elsewhere. When the presence of the Emperor at the window became known the stood at a large window on the first story; there was such a howl, mingled with cheers, that it must have causel him a very uncomfortable feeling.

Beer houses and bake shops were pillaged by the wholesale, and serious conflicts between the police and rioters occurred in various sections of the city.

The military remained under arms, but took no part in the struggle.

A leading Sociaust said that he believed the uprising was entirely spontaneous, and therefore exceedingly sign ficant. He said the Germans are ready to repeat the lesson of 1848.

By Saturday morning comparative quiet was restored. In the atternoon the Kaiser rode on horseback through the streets. In some places he was greeted with loyal cheers and in othert with hisses. There is no doubt that the Socialists had much to do with Thursday's demonstration but the many looted bakerles are muce witnes es to the need of the city's poor. need of the city's poor. The shops stormed by the hungry mob were visited by great crowds of the curious. About noon several fights took place.

As the Empcror rode along the avenue Unter Den Linden the cheers were without a groan or hiss to mar them until a point was reached where about 150 Socialists were gathered. As the Kaiser approached, with his aide riding at a short distance behind, the mob of Socialists jeered and groaned. The Kaiser remained majestic and erect. Never had he presented an appearance more like that of his soldier grandiather. He seemed not to hear a jeer or a groan or to give the slightest attention as the police, with drawn swords, rashed to the spot and threw themselves upon the Socialists. The latter seemed unprepared for an attack. They had apparently calculated that there would be no interference with them under the presence of the Kaiser. A lew stood stubborn for a moment resenting by epithest the assault of the police. Then they tried to escape. The police cut them down with their swords, not killing any, but wounding several. The leaders were seized and hurried to prison on a charge of lesse majeste. The instant the disturbance was passed and the cheers renewed, the Kaiser dropped the mask of impassiveness and showed by his manner that he recognized the plaudits of the people.
