A Race Between Tongue and Hoof

"YOU want anything?" in a decidedly teasing tone, was the greeting of old Joel Gringer...

"Hello!" rang on their ears, hoarse and infuriated: "Stop! stop, I command you! Young man, I'll horse-whip you on the spot if you don't give me your daughter!"

"Hold up there! I'm an officer of the law!" demanded another voice, drowning the rest of the preacher's "forasmuch."

"Put spurs. Foreasmuch as Richard W. Anderson and Annie Gringer have consented to—"

"How under the sun them hogs ever did git into old man Mason's cornfield jest when Dick Anderson wanted to steal Joel Gringer's daughter?"—New York Press.

When I reached the quarters of the Christian Commission, Mr. Cole, of Boston, the Chief Agent, was standing beside a tent, in deep thought.

"I never thought of that; but it's full of barrels and boxes and is not in order."

"No matter, there will be shelter and room, and there is a lock on the door, and I'll get on all right."

"Certainly, Of course she can." And I opened the door, and that stately woman, with all her dignity upon her, which was really a part of herself, entered, glad to find even such a shelter as that.

As Miss Dix was old enough to be my mother, of course there was but one thing to do, and that was to give up my bed of shavings and straw to her, and with the stub of an old broom try to clean another part of the floor for myself.
