pressed in army and navy circles concerning the criticism of a German paper relative to our army and navy The paper spoke of our army as inferfor in material to that of Russia, and said that while we were able to build a hundred large battle-ships, we had no silors to man them; and that our military personnel was without patriotism, rotten and weakened by desertion. person or people should be indifferent to criticism. It is always worth while to see ourselves as others think they see us, no matter how blinded by prejudice or conceit the critic may be The triumph of the powerful, disciplined and well led German army over the tegenerate, effeminated and ill-commanded French army, thirty years ago has furnished the German people and press food for great arrogance and rouble that Germany is having in West Africa with petty savage tribes, which she is unable to subdue, would suggest the beauty of modesty, or the doubt of invincibility. We do not need a great army. The moat to our castle is three thousand miles wide, and the lubbers who cross it even in friendship are off their food and non-aggressive when they arrive. Von Moltke said that he had been able to plan for the landing of an army in England, but he had never been able to see how he he had never been able to see how he would get it away. The difficulty in both landing and retreating in this country will be as many times more difficult as the Atlantic Ocean is wider than the British Channel, or about one hundred and fifty times more difficult Whenever Germany or any other peaceful shores, she will meet with adequate resistance.—Lanark (Ill.)
