A Decree of Face

By Mary E. Dairymple.

"Cynthia!" The petulant voice from above. It heard, fell unheedingly on the cars of the girl crouched on the rocks below, her great, sombre eyes fixed seaward, in a tense, unseeing gaze, as if striving to pierce beyond the sky-line of dark, threatening clouds, her fingers clasping her knees. Despair—unutterable grief—a deen, hopeless void—something almost aumatural depicted in the crushed attitude and drawn features.

"Cynthia!" The girl roused herself as if by pained effort, brushed back the dark mass of hair, damp from the sea mist.

a low moan escaping her as sho slowly rose and dragged herself up the path.

"You'll have yourself lookin' like a ghost," snapped the old lady sharply, as the girl appeared and both moved in the direction of the tiny cottage, not far distant.

Frequent and bitter were the imprecations of the honest, sturdy seamen of the little fishing town, be-stowed upon the handsome stranger who, the previous summer, seeking rest and novelty from the gay round of pleasure in the seething, fashion-ble world, had sojourned for a few brief weeks in their village. Small wonder was it that Cynthia—gay, light-hearted, dark-eyed Cyn-thia—unused to the world and its ways, in a short time should listen for the approach of the massive, well-knit figure as he made his way along the sandy beach, and her girlish heart beat tumultuously and the faint color grew in her cheeks at the whispered nothings that came so glibly from the lips of the newcomer. "Amusing," Dick Belding commented, with a shrug and a smile, "but, by Jove! nevertheless, charming."

Her quaint wonder at his description of the world—his world—that great whirling vortex of pleasure and gayety, fascinated the girl. But at length his stay came to an end. "He was summoned back to town," he laughingly told her.

"But you will come back!" There was a pleading tremory in her voice; her hand lay almost beseechingly on his.

A little annoying frown came between Belding's eyes, but the next instant he laughed—a melodious, ringing laugh. The girl's eyes met his blue ones sorrowfully for a moment. Something gripped him—conscience. perhaps—and then he laughed again. "The girl is in love with me," he

Belding, the irrepressible, he who had never known a serious moment in all his gay, careless life, had actually been taken seriously, and he laughed

To Belding this little flirtation had been a very pleasant "incident"—to the girl it had meant the giving of her unswerving, girlish affection, lasting with life itself.

"Why do you laugh? You will come back to me?"

"Wry, of course, little one," he answered, smilingly, kissing the rosy lips.

And then he went from the little village. Weeks went into months and Cynthia's lithe figure lost its buoyancy. Her laughing face grew grave and pensive and the simple fisher folk sighed when the girl passed, she who was their pride, and waxed angry at the mention of the stranger's name.

"At high noon today the climax to what has been a very pretty romance was brought about, when Miss Ethel, only daughter of John Waring, magnate, was given in marriage to Richard Belding, clubman and scion of an old Knickerbacker family.

"The happy pair will spend the honeymoon in southern waters on the Diana, the yacht recently purchased by Mr. Belding. Society read this item and nodded approvingly. A fiercely hot, tropical sun bea unrelentingly on the figure of a man weakly clinging to a fragment of wreckage in mid-ocean. For days he had lain like this, after the typhoon, which comes sudden and swift in the treacherous southern Pacific, swept down upon his yacht tearing the craft to atoms while he helplessly watched the merciless waves swee over the deck, bearing away the crev —the young wife who had pledged her troth a few weeks before. "Oh, God! let me die," he moaned brokenly. The burning thirst that scorched his throat would soon take Suddenly a long sandy beach stretched before him. In the back-ground a great wall of cliffs broke against the sky.

A figure beckoned, and as it came out from the shadows the man recor nized the face—he laughed—a dull, mirthless cackle and then stopped short—it was not the happy, girlish face he had left in the little fishing village, but a white-faced woman, stern and pittless.

"Cynthia!" he stretched out his arms to the apparition, "forgive."

The spar floated away and the blue waters of the Pacific closed over the hapless man.

In the gray twilight gloom a girl, wanfaced, a strange, eager light in the midnight eyes, gazes seaward, unceas-
