delphis. The authorities are endeavoring to unposed crime, but the manner in which the poor girl met her death seems destined to remain one of the secrets of the Leleware.

The victim was a refined young woman of 23, and a graduate of one of the female seminaries at Shamekin, in which town her parents resided. Reverses in fortune made it necessary for the young woman to take up dressmaking as a means of austeining the family position in society. Somewhat less than a year ago she removed from Shamokin to Divindednith, where she found that her ago she removed from Shamokin to Philadelphia, where she found that her earnings would more materially add to earnings would more materially add to the family income. Pretty, well-samested, and being of refined qualities she soon found herself carning a lucrative income. She found a home with the Edenbaums, society folk, at 1827 North street. She soon had scores of admirers each anxious to bask in the sunlight of the dark eyes from whose liquid depths, a judge of nature might fathom a ray of passion. Alas, too weak for the allurements of a selfish world. a selfish world.

Among her train of admirers (some of whom were numbered among the crite of the city) was one whose name will go into the criminal recovis of the sase as Harry. He was loved, the others tolerated as the story goes. Harry was a bar tender. That is what made the rivals so jealous. Carrie had given them the cold shoulder in preference to a common fellow like Harry. They were to be married soon, so the rossips said a month ago and the hapless girl left the house of the Eden-baum's, only returning occasionally. She removed up town, nobody knows where, and here the story of what is positively known ends. The rest is where and here the story of what is positively known ends. The rest is wristen in the Great Recorder's book. The next heard from her, her lifeless body was taken from the river at a point opposite Morris & Mathi's ship yard. That was on the morning of June 2. The water thereabout was shallow it being low tide hour. The more lengthing young for was, turned ones heartful young for was, turned Attention was first directed to the case by the finding of a woman's felt hat, descrated with black plumes and a parrot, a postetloop, handkerfallef, gloves and small leather caba on some thouting spars at David Baird's spar fosting spars at David Baird's spar yards on leach street. articles were neatly arranged, with the exception of the caba, which was in the water. He took them to John Smith's Rye Beach Hotel, where the contents were examined and the first clue found to the dead woman's identity.

The young woman appeared to be between twenty-one and twenty-five yours old, was five feet three inches high and weighed about 120 pounds. She possessed a beautiful form, the only blemish being a wart on the under side of her wrist. Her hair was long and light in color. She also had an upper set of false teeth. The woman wore a black fersey, black cashmere dress, blue stockings, red garters with cheap silver buckles, button shoes and clean underclothing. Around her neek was a black ribbon with a gold heart attached. She also wore rhinestones set in gold in her ears. On one of her wrists was a chain bracelet tied with a string. Several bruises on the limbs and body looked like finger marks.

The caba contained a change of soiled underciothes, and in the pocket-book was found a card bearing the name of J. Cyrus Edenbaum. Philadel-

She says that while looking out of her second-story window between 12 and 1 o'clock the night of the marder, she saw two men and a woman atanding on the spar abed wharf. Her description of them is meager and warles, but she insists that she heard the woman pleading with the men and then scream, "On, for God's sake, don't!" One of the men replied: "Yes, we will," and then there was a spinsh and the men ran away. This happened not fifty yards from her house, but Mrs. Colemier, for some unexplained reason, failed to raise an alarm.

The story Charles Simpkins, of 905 North Second street, Camdon, a deck hand on the Vine street ferry, tells, partly corroborated Mrs. Colehmier's startling theory of murder. He say that about 10 o'clock the night preced that about 10 o'clock the night preceding the crime, two men and two young women, one of whom he thinks the dead girl is, crossed the river from Philadelphia. He noticed one of them who carried a abba and a coat, who answers the description of Carrie flumphreys because she was so lively. She were a black dress and Jersey. Shortly after reaching Camden, Simpkins says the two men returned to Philadelphia alone on the Arasapla, but on the 1 o'clock trip of his boat from Philadelphia alone on the Arasapha, but on the 1 o'clock trip of his boat from Philadelphia the same men went to Camden again, and they made anxious inquiries of him as to the time the last boat left the Camden side. When he told them 1:30, they said they would have time to do what they wanted, and they went up in the direction of Beach street. They returned shortly and caught the last boat to Philadelphia.

These men have never been found. The crime will probably remain a mystery. mystery.

Two women had died suddenly and circumstances pointed to her as the murderess. These victims had been dear friends of the accused. Miss Zoldoske was a milliner and made her home with Dr. Mitshell and wife at Richland Center. Her arrest followed elose upon the receipt of a cipher at Richland Center. Her arrest followed close upon the receipt of a cipher dispatch from Prof. Haines of Rush Medical College, Chicago, who analyzed the stomach of Miss Etta Mally, whose sudden and agonizing death occurred Jan. 9, 1861, not many hours after she had enten candy given her by Miss Rose. Anthony Mally, brother of the dead girl, made the complaint, when convinced by statements from physicians that the death was caused by strychnine poisoning. Christiann was called its and as other nails of a smaller size appeared they were removed antil the auraber reached fifteen, most of them very small. The young lady is now able to walk, and the only evidence of the nuils having been in her foot are little marks where they were taken out. The affair is the talk of the neighborhood for miles around, and it is regarded as one of the most remarkable occurrences ever heard of in that vicinity.

Divers in the harber of Syraonase have discovered a magnifleent marble building, whose highest point is only three metres under the water. The building contains great staftways and columned inits. It is believed that the edifice was once used as a bath or a temple.

On the 4th of July, in front of Cooper Institute, was erected and dedicated the statue of the late Congressman, Hon. S. S. Cox, the work of Miss Louise Lawson, of New York City. The memorial is the outgrowth of a National Letter-Carriers movement, started shortly after Mr. Cox's death, to testify the appreciation of this great body of hard-working officials of his earnest hard-working officials of his earnest advocacy of eight hours as the legal day's labor of the letter-carrier. A competition was invited, and there were saveral well-known sculptors as competitors, but the award and contract was given to Miss Lawson.

The figure represents Mr. Cox in his favorite attitude as public speaker, is east in bronze by the Ronard Company, and is eight feet high, standing on a pedestal or granite nine feet high.
