Mrs. Cohleigh's Dishwater.

Mr. Cobleagu went up stairs into s bedroom the other noon after dinner to move a heavy clothespress for his wife. He worked away at it some five minutes and was getting it about where he wanted it, when the awful affair tipped over and came down so suddenly that Mr. Cobleigh was unable to get out or the way in time, and being knocked over a cimir he fell in such a way as to have one of his legs pinned in between the clothes press and the chair. As he was on his breast, he found himself power less to get away, and so he screamed to his wife to come to his aid. Ho knew he could make her hear if she was down stairs, and he had heard her moving about but a moment before. But there was no response to his cries. He shoutes till he was hourse, but still no answer.

Five minutes passed—ten, fifteen. A half hour was gone. It seemed almost a century to the imprisoned man, with his nose so close to the rag carpet that it seemed as if he would never get the odor out of his system. Seem he heard a door open and shut down stairs, and gathering up his remaining energies higave a final yell. In a moment his wife had reached him. Her first prompting was to ask him how he came in such plight, but a glance at ids inflamed far. checked the prompting, and she speedily set to work to rescue him from his un-happy position. When he got out he wanted to know where in thunder she'd been, leaving him to die under a clothe press. She said she had just stepped over to Mrs. Murray's "for a minute while her dishwater was cooling."

Mr. Cobleigh didn't receive this explanation with a very good grace, and on the qualities of dishwater for cooling Mrs. Caldeigh had been gone nearly three-quarters of an hour, but the time had not been lost. During that brief conference with Mrs. Murray she had learned a new style of knife platting how many yards of material it took for a dolman, what was going to be worn in the way of an evenders, what Mrs. Murray's hat would cost, healths a thorough canvass of what she had better have for summer dress just to wear afternoons All this information Mrs. Cobleigh acquired while Mr. Cobleigh was closeted with the chathespreas, but also pr kept it to herself J.
