GUILTY OF MANSLAUGHTER.

Lord Montagu's Daughter-in-Law Sentenced to Prison for Her Child's Death.

DUBLIN, April 5.—The trial of Annie Margaret Montagu, for the manslaughter of her three-year-old child, was concluded yesterday. Much interest is attached to the case owing to the social standing of the prisoner.

The evidence in the case showed that the deceased child had disobeyed her governess, and was put in a dark room for punishment, and was afterward found dead in the room. The room was about nine feet seven inches high, and the space allowed for the child to walk about in was about six feet square. The room had neither window, nor fireplace, and when the door was closed there was no light. The metal rings had been screwed into the woodwork.

It appears that the governess, Rose Desell, found that the little girl had been guilty of a slight breach of propriety, and put her in the dark room. When Mrs. Montagu returned, and learned what the child had done, and scolded the little one, and said she must punish her. She then tied the child's arms above the elbow with a stocking, and attached that to the ring in the wall.

She then went away and did not return to the room until three hours afterward. Mrs. Montagu opened the door and called the child, but the little one did not answer, and after calling the second time, Mrs. Montagu went in hurriedly and untied the string. The child then fell and the mother lifted her and ran to the bedroom, took off stockings and clothes, laid her on the bed, and ran downstairs for help. The governess came back with the mother and the child was put in a bath, artificial respiration being tried and brandy used, but without success.

Mrs. Montagu was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment.
