Interesting World's Fair Building to Be Erected by New York.

One of the prettiest structures which will be erected by New York state will be that for the mineral exhibit. Architect Isaac G. Perry has just completed the drawings for it. They call for a rectangular pavillon in pure Roman-lonic architecture, 31x01x22 feet high. The four corners are to be surmounted by balustrades; the caps of the fluted columns are to be richly carved; there will be an ornamental frieze, and the spandrels will be deconto the ornamentation. The structure will be of white and gold. There will be a balastrade all about the floor, except across the front. The front, or entrance, is of a concave half circle. Directly opposite the en-trance an obelisk will rise to a height of thirty feet. This will be three feet square at the base and taper gradually to the top.

It will be composed of rocks illustrating the geological formation of the earth as has been developed by re-search. The accompanying illustration rives an excellent idea of how the completed pavilion will look.

A Warning to Journalists. With a slew to averting further trouble, writes Eugene Field in the Chicago News Record, we ask our newspaper friends elsewhere to disseminate assiduously the information that news-paper work is not to be had in Chicago; that every place is filled here; that already we have with us an army of unemployed reporters, and that every newspaper writer who comes to Chi-cago with a view of getting work is pretty sure to have nothing but his trouble for his pains.

Rare Literacy Treasures.

Lady Gordon, chairman of the British women's committee, has turned up som curlous literary treasures in her search through English Hibraries and book-shops for uniterial. Among other things she found a map of Italy, made by an Engliseemann in Dante's time. Another is the "Boke of St. Allums," printed in 1430 and attributed to Dame Julia Barnes. It treats of hawking, busting and heraldry, and is among the earliest books printed in England.

It Will Be of the Pompelan Style of Architecture

The Vermont building at the world's fair will be, when completed, one of the most unique on the grounds. The style is Pompeian. On the right and left of the entrance are two shafts with allegorical figures, representing agriculture and quarrying and stonecutting— the two principal industries of the state. The entrance is through a portico into a courtyard, in the center of which is a handsome murble fountain. Marble will also be used all through the interior. On the right and left are
