KATHERINE GRAY.

It was a pretty room, this cell 29, as Katherine Gray called her parlor and alcove suite in the Norman, Cedar street, Blank city. Behind a gray screen, slightly ajar, there were a tiny gas stove and a singing kettle; a half open door of a cabinet revealed odd pieces of china and shining silver.

This is what the sun shone upon through the big east bay window New Year's morning—this and Katherine Gray at her breakfast table. The postman had made his one round for the day. Some business house had sent her a calendar, and there was one letter. This she was reading. She made a pretty picture as she sat thus. With all the rest of the world she was having a holiday.

"I wish," she said—she had a fashion of thinking aloud when alone—"I wish that this letter could have been delayed until tomorrow. I don't like being so disturbed on New Year's day. There is a saying that as the first day goes so goes the whole year." Then she laughed and looked very pretty when laughing. "I wonder if I'm to have a proposal of marriage every day in the year and feel as bad about every one as I do about this!"

Then she rose and walked to the mirror. The reflection was not unpleasant; she smiled as she looked at it. But she said: "There's no use in being flattered by the glass, Katherine; the fact remains that this is my birthday and that you are 34 years old today. Here in my hand is an offer of marriage from an extremely worthy and respectable man, who would take you away from cell 29 and its 'kitcheny parlor air' and set you in a handsome home, where you wouldn't have to hide your head in a bureau drawer, bake and boil in a dish, or eat 'boughten pie'—who would make a lady of leisure of you, and who, best of all, or what ought to be best of all, would love you and be good to you. And yet," she continued, "you hesitate. With little lines coming around your eyes and mouth, with work and weariness stretching out indefinitely before you—you hesitate. I am an idiot, but I may as well start my usual business sense, your keen appreciation of a good bargain."

Truly she was not insensible to the material advantages that were offered to her in this letter from Mr. Browne, wholesale grocer and dealer in canned goods.

As she sat thus, with her hands clasped above her head, she thought: "If it were not for that letter received and answered 10 years ago today—the first of the year is a fateful day to me, surely—I know what my reply would be to this one. If I could only forget, but I may as well start my life anew today as any time."

Then she went to her desk and took down the old calendar. "You've had your day, and you may as well go with the rest. One nail drives out another. Your successor is here with his ready-made wisdom. By the way, I'll see what sort this is," she said. "It's some advertising scheme, no doubt, but it may have a message for me, just the same."

She read: "Be more afraid of the companionship that enslaves than of the solitude that leaves you free." Use the Highflyer bicycle. Best in the world."

She read the quotation twice, smiling as she did so, and hung the new calendar in its place.

At 2 o'clock she made a careful street toilet and went out for her dinner. Determined not to dine alone, she invited little Joe, the newsboy, who brought her morning paper and who did small errands for her and other occupants of the Norman, to go with her.

To be sure, when she asked him if he had been to dinner, he admitted that he had been "wid de gang to de mission. But dat," he said, "don't cut no figger. I kin eat jes' as well for all dat."

He verified his assertion. Katherine never had a more satisfactory guest.

Katherine sat in the early winter twilight at her piano, singing some sweet old song of her early youth.

Then there came a vigorous ring at her door. It flashed across her mind that possibly Mr. Browne was going to forestall the postman and know his fate by word of mouth. Before going to the door she lighted the gas and went to the mirror. Standing there, she said, "Statistics show, Katherine, that women over 30—"

"Then the bell rang again. As if wavering a little she glanced at the calendar. Bravely the words shown before her eyes, "Be more afraid of the companionship that enslaves than of the solitude that leaves you free."

"All that helps," she said. Then she opened wide the door.

It certainly was not Mr. Browne who stood there. Mr. Browne was short and rotund, florid also. This man was tall, of fine proportions, with clear cut features and a fine mustache.

"Miss Gray?" he said interrogatively. "Yes."

"My name is—but perhaps you remember my name," and the tall man stepped uninvited into the room.

"Yes," she said, her eyes blazing. "I remember your name. It is the name of the only man who ever treated me with respect. Go back to the silence that has covered you for years."

"Not yet," he said. "The morning mail brought me this letter that you wrote me 10 years ago. You accepted me then. You said that you loved me, I've the proof of it in my hands," and he opened a letter yellow and stained.

"You say?"

"Dear Everly, I—"

"Oh, don't," she cried. "Sit down beside me while I tell you. The postoffice in the city where we both lived 10 years ago has recently undergone repairs. A package of letters has been exhumed by the gas fitters or plumbers. This is one of them. I only hope the others have been forwarded to as happy a destination. For the words in the letter—they are true now as then, are they not, Katherine?"

"Oh, I don't know," she said.

"Find out, dear, as quickly as you can. The years have been long and hard, but these last eight hours have been torture. I had no idea where to look for you—"

"What do you think I must have endured?" she asked.

"I don't dare think of it." Then he added, as 99 men out of 100 would have done: "We won't talk about it or think of it. We will forget the sadness of the past and plan for your future."

"How did you find me?" asked Katherine.

"I saw you at the restaurant, where you were entertaining that little hoodlum. I knew you at once. There's no woman in the world like you. I too, had a great victim and don't not follow you, but an hour later I caught the boy on the street and by my silvery eloquence and a dollar learned your name and where you lived."

"My name?"

"Yes. You might have changed it, and then—I should not be here."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Grand Display of FINE DRESS GOODS

DRESS GOODS is such a bewildering topic that we will not attempt a full description, but give a partial outline, which you can fill in by a personal inspection. There are the plain and changeable diagonals; plain, plaid, striped and invisible plaid serges; fancy mixtures in all sorts of odd weaves, dots, threads, cross-threads, hair-lines, lines here and there, many at a glance appearing alike, but upon examination are found entirely different. Our assortment of silks is complete—china silks, china surah, plain surah, bengaline, plain, figured and changeable silks, in all the new shot effects. Full line of fancy braids to match any color of dress goods.

.....In Wraps
We find the most stylish and the prevailing mode to be the Cape, in some of its variations, single, double or triple capes. Some are plain, others very highly decorated, with fancy indented braid, butterfly colors, or some full arrangement at the neck, so much improved this season by the feminine fancy. To some, coats only are the correct garment. To those we would say coats are equally fashionable and stylish, many of these having caps also attached—sometimes one, two or three, at the taste or inclination of the wearer may desire.

We have this season, for the first time, added a Millinery Department, and have spared neither trouble nor expense to make it a success. The result exceeds our most sanguine expectations. This department will be under the same management and conducted on the same principles that have always characterized our entire business. We shall keep everything in trimmed and untrimmed hats, novelties of every description. Having secured a trimmer noted for her artistic and skillful work, we are enabled to suit all tastes. We invite a careful inspection of our entire store. All welcome.
