AN AMIABLE TRAIT.

As a people we Americans desire a title at long range, but face to face we dearly prize a lord. Nowhere in the civilized world is a titled stranger certain of a more cordial reception than here among a people who arose to combat and baulsh hereditary privilege and caste. This is not only creditable to us as a people, but really evidence of that breadth that seems to inure to wide contact with all condi tions of secial and evvil life.

We of course see but few titled personages, and only rarely do we see a royal personage. If we mistake not our first princely visitor was the Prince of Wales in 1880. Our people have seen several princes and princess es since that time, and at least one emperor and empress; dukes, earls, marguises and lesser nobles have not been rare visitors for many years, and they been welcomed and made much at home with us without exception.

But there is a feature of this welcome to distinguished persons that is peculiar to us. We are, perhaps, glad to see with our own eyes that monarchs and nobles are only men and women going through the world with a little more noise, perhaps, but substantially like the rest of us.

Such strangers are generally the most modest and unassuming persons one sees, and devoid of that disfiguring self-consciousness that betrays the unpracticed. These persons who come as visitors are really illustrations of good manners, and as we cannot borrow their titles, we may possibly imitate their deportment in our several ' JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS.
