NEW SLEEVES, ng, or at least in an elaborate style suitable for dinner drasses. The arm size is strongly piped to make it solid, and the sleeves to be worn are basted in strongly, not exactly sewn in, but the running stitches are set close, and when the endance well fastened there is no danger of the sleeve ripping out.

I noticed one dress of dove colored changeable silk which had a narrow flounce of black silk at the buttom and a fichu made of dotted net, with a ruffled border. There were sleeves made of black lace in two puffs, with Tom Thomb ribbon run in through the meshes lengthwise and finished with four rosettes of the same. At the alceve ripping out. with four rosettes of the same. At the wrists the lace was shirred. There were other sleeves where the forearm part consisted of brocade, an outline of black over gray. The upper sleeve was held in a very full puff by a buckle of the dove colored silk of which the dress was made. This made a desirable variety, the black lace former the constitution of the constitu Sounce and fichu forming the connecting

Two pretty sleeves for young ladies were up into gowns as fast as the weary finger of the dressmakers can accomplish it is Two pretty sleeves for young ladies were made of lace and the dress material, one of the dress material, one of the shoulder reaching backward. Beneath this was a heavy fall of lace. In some cases the sleeve is made of china crape stiffened with milliner's net.

There is a thin quality of china crape which is almost transparent, and which is sery much liked for draperies and trimmings, as it is so flexible and falls into folds that would rejoice an artist.

The other sleeve is of crane hand em.

There is a decided liking shown for this corinth red and the different shades of mings, as it is so flexible and falls into folds that would rejoice an artist.

The other sleeve is of crape, hand embroidered with tiny flowerets in natural colors, this one, for instance, having blue myosotis, with its dusky green leaves on a ground of pale maize crape. The ruffle at the bottom and the cup at the top are cut out in deep vandyke points and edged with a very narrow fringe, such as is used on valentines or holiday cards. These trimble bottom. There was also a folded belt of the crepon, with a stiff windmill bow in the bottom.

mings are made of white, stiff muslin, worked with silver threads. The dress to which this sleeve belonged was of black silk, with the same flower worked alternately in blue and corn color. There were sleaves for the street for this gown in the regulation style of gigot. The crape ones made a festive habit of it all.

A dress seen recently struck me for its quiet elegance. It was of china silk in a dull plum blue, with faded purple azalia blossoms, natural size, scattered over it. At the bottom was a festooned flounce made of maize crape, with a narrow black lace laid flat on the edge, the pattern up-ward. On the shoulders the same idea was carried out, and there was a lace edged

It is quite a pretty idea to have a V shaped notch cut out at the wrist of the long sleeves, as these long, snug sleeves are not apt to add anything of beauty to the hand.

But the V notch somehow gives a slender thriftly and sensibly made over their last senson's blazer soits by cutting off the longer and narrower. Anything that has an unbroken outline is dangerous to those whose beauty has begun to fade, and the hands and wrists show the ravages of time than the face. I think.

The sheerest linen lawn, or cambric where linen is not liked, is used as a foundation for lace of the softest and most delicate description. The nightgowns are fit for a princess. One in particular struck my appreciation of the beautiful. It was half high in the neck and shirred in the back to a tape and open in front V shape. All around the neck was a deep fall of valenciennes lace, fastened on the shoulders by how of baky ribbon. The ways two darks hows of haby ribbon. There were two deep points of the lace down the front, fastened by loops and ends of ribbon. The sleeves were made of two widths of the lace joined bottom and finished with a bow. Around

If the evolution of sleeves continues, the daintiest and prettiest of them are those there will be a time when the sleeves will cost treble the amount that the rest of the gown requires. Many ladles now have three pairs of sleeves to each nice dress—one pair of lace, one of the dress material gant. Black net also makes pretty fichus edged with lace and having two or mor very narrow rows of black velvet ribbon.

One of the very daintiest summer dress was worn at an outdoor fete at Newport, and yet it was a simple gown to excite so much adminition. It was of dotted or gandie, all white, and made with a double skirt and gathered full. Over the skirt was s flounce made of thin green crape, cut out in vandykes and then accordion plaited. It looked like a fringe of grass around the dress. There were small resettes at equal distances all around the tops of the ruffles. The sleeves were balloon, of surah the same grass green shade, but the crowning beauty was the folded fichu, with a deep ruffle of organdle and with the crape ruffling, which formed a point in front. A full box plaining of ribbon formed a sort of collar, and a straw hat covered with hedge roses and leaves completed the whole costume, wit' a parasol of white lare.

There will, it is said, be many dresses cut with double skirts, and clan plaids are to be utilized in bias bands on them. Wood color is to be a favorite one for tailor goods, jackets and gowns, and there will be some attempt to revive the tufted and boucle effects for fall dress goods. But just now the varieties of crepon are certainly in higher favor than any other weave of goods. These, when worn with a menterie with a deep lace flounce for a wrap, are the prettlest things possible. The black or dark blue croponettes, trimmed with insertion of yellow lace iaid on flat, are a most elegant and pleasing combination One made of myrtle green composite, with garniture of white cloth with silver braid-ing, is stylish and becoming.
