THE BOYS WENT BACK

Fruitless Strike by Drivers at Wm. Penn Colliery.

MOST OF THEM REINSTATED

Fourteen Went Out Because They Were Not Paid for Driving an Extra Mule—The Ringleaders are Barred Out.

The driver boys who struck at the Wm. Penn colliery on Monday have surrendered and all but three of them are again at work. The boys who are still idle were the ringleaders of the movement and Superintendent Lewis has filled their places with other boys. The strike in no way interfered with the operations of the colliery, although quite a number of the drivers were engaged in it.

The history of the strike appears to be that each driver had been allowed two mules, but as there were some mules to spare the officials decided to give such drivers as cared to handle them three mules. This, it is claimed, was a benefit to the drivers as well as to the company. While it divided the work of two mules among three and made the labor on the animals easier, it also enabled the drivers to increase the size and reduce the number of trips and gave them less work.

One of the drivers, however, did not take this view of the matter and considered that he should receive more money for driving three mules than he was receiving when handling two. Upon this theory he demanded an increase of wages, which was refused and, with thirteen sympathizers, a strike was inaugurated. Incomplete organization, lack of funds and poor encouragement from their parents made the strike uphill work for the boys and after holding out two days they decided to apply for re-instatement in their old positions. The company complied with the requests of eleven of them and barred out three of the ringleaders and the reinstated boys started work again this morning, but with only two mules. The extra mule was desired by some of the boys, but the company concluded that it would leave no loop-hole open for another strike.

It has been reported that while the boys were out they attempted to harass the officials of the company and caused disturbances, but this is denied by both sides.

MAIN STREET DISTURBANCE

Sam Block Meets an Unlucky Customer. Fell From a Third Story Window, Slipped While Jumping on Cars—Knee Crushed.

A Pole whose name could not be learned caused considerable disturbance at the corner of Main and Cherry streets this morning, but got away before he could be arrested. He went into Sam Block's store to purchase a pair of shoes, but the prices did not suit him. The clerk advised him to seek another store and the visitor took the advice unkindly. He behaved in such a manner that it was necessary to eject him. The Pole walked away, but soon returned and kicked open the door of Block's store. This seemed to satisfy him and he again walked away, only to return again and chase Block behind the counter of the store. The Pole remained outside for quite a while with a large stone in his hand and when Block attempted to come out of the store he was again chased behind the counter. He maintained a blockade for quite a while and several times threatened to smash the windows of the store, but finally walked away without doing any damage. Block is now trying to locate the man.
